THE RHINE

THE leading rivers of our globe have played a most important part in its development. They are more than mere currents of descending water. Ideas float along their surface. They have ever been the great boundaries of nations. They are the grand avenues of commerce. Their beds have been held sacred as the dwelling-places of gods. They form natural barriers to ambition, and halting-places for conquest. The destinies of mankind have, therefore, been determined by their channels. Their interest increases in proportion to the historic souvenirs which seem to mingle with their foam and murmur with their waves. In this sense one of the first among the world's great rivers is the noble Rhine. Others can boast of greater breadth and volume, a longer distance traversed to the sea, and even mightier commerce borne upon their waves; but none, except the Nile, is richer in historic memories, and even that, from its remote antiquity, cannot appeal so closely to our sympathies.

THE NOBLE RIVER.

The Rhine is the great avenue of central Europe, and on its silver thread, for seven hundred miles, are strung the pearls of love, adventure, romance, tragedy, and comedy, till one may fancy it a necklace of transcendent value, rich, like the "page of knowledge," with the "spoils of time." It is, in fact, its constant succession of beautiful and historic objects, each crowned with its appropriate legend, that gives to this great stream of Germany its matchless charm. Viewed as a river merely, the Hudson is in some respects superior to the Rhine; but add to the latter the legends and the memories of two thousand years, and the scales turn. What wonder, therefore, that the Rhine is to the Germans what the Nile was to the Egyptians,—a source of national pride and delight, a never-ending theme of song and story. Within its depths are treasures of golden memories. Let down the net of fancy at almost any point, and you can bring up gems of greater value to the world than any pearls that divers find. Two thousand years ago its name was as well known beside the Tiber as it is now along the Hudson. Navigable for more than six hundred miles through the very heart of Europe, its dominion has been battled for throughout the centuries. Its banks have echoed to the shouts of warlike Gauls, Teutons, Romans, Franks, and Normans, and on its placid surface have been cast the shadows of the world's great conquerors and chieftains, — Cæsar, Attila, Charlemagne, Napoleon, and Von Moltke.

But to judge of the power and beauty of the Rhine one should not view it at random, but rather mark its origin and trace its growth along that path which leads it from a mountain rivulet to an imposing and majestic stream. To do this,

we should go at the outset into the heart of Switzerland, and stand before an Alpine glacier, which, like some awful prehistoric monster, creeps forth in menace from a sea of ice, supplied from distant peaks, whose summits pierce the azure of the sky. There is a practical as well as a poetic side to these grand glaciers. They are not merely the everlasting drape of the Alps, folding them summer and winter in their robes of ice. They are, also, the great storehouses from which the rivers of Europe are replenished; for, from the many wounds inflicted on them by the arrows of the sun, their frigid life-blood oozes fast, forming a multitude of little torrents which finally unite to constitute one glittering stream. It is in this way that the Rhine is born. The traveler can behold it at the glacier's terminus, leaving exultingly its ice-bound cradle, as though rejoicing in the thought of freedom. The tourist must have little imagination who can stand beside this rivulet, destined to gain, ere long, such vast proportions, and not compare it to a human life: both at the start so tiny and helpless, so easily inclined in one way or another; yet fated, later on, perhaps to win the admiration of the world, change, it may be, the history of nations, and ultimately be lost in the two oceans, — one of Time, the other of Eternity.

girdled home, which you are in such haste to leave. Care and responsibility will come to you soon enough; and these your sparkling waves, which can now only glitter in the sun and murmur in their shallow path, will soon bear on their breast the commerce of great cities, and roll in majesty past many

A few miles farther down its course, we find the youthful river rushing on, apparently eager to prove its new-found strength and speed. Ah, river! I have often thought, you will not soon discover a safer or more lovely spot than this, your mountain-a lovely meadow and embattled crag. What an amount of life and history hangs on this little crystal thread!

Another interesting point in the development of the young Rhine is where it is joined by its first tributary. The meeting-place is in the vicinity of one of the most impressive spots in Europe, known as "Pfeiffer's Gorge." Through this tremendous chasm the river Tamina, apparently in frantic haste to meet the Rhine, has worn itself a path. On either side tower dark walls of rock, which are not merely perpendicular, but actually bend toward each other, so that they seem about to fall and fill the river with their mass. On one side, a light wooden bridge clings to the rocks, as if in fear, some forty feet above the stream. At first, I halted at the entrance, afraid to trust myself to such a frail support; but, as I ventured further through the gorge, I quite forgot where I was walking, in admiration of the place. Yet, for a single moment, I was never more terrified in my life than in that dark ravine. When we had entered it, quite unobserved by us, black clouds were rolling up their masses in the summer sky. Accordingly, half an hour later, there suddenly came a blinding flash, as though the blade of a colossal sword had been swept downward through the gorge, and then withdrawn with inconceivable rapidity. This was succeeded almost instantly by a terrific crash of thunder, which fairly made our hearts stand still. Moreover, that single peal was but the prelude to a dozen more, whose echoes, harsh and jagged as the rocks themselves, were hurled about, from cliff to cliff, until they seemed the screams and laughter of malignant demons.

Soon after being reinforced by this ally, the youthful Rhine acquires an experience unlike all others in its history, by a temporary sojourn in, and identification with, Lake Constance. A prize too precious for one nation to defend seems this enchanting inland sea; for, in its circuit of one hundred miles, five different countries — Bavaria, Baden, Austria, Würtemberg, and Switzerland — encircle it like sentinels. I first beheld it one evening, in 1880, when on my way to the Passion Play at Ober-Ammergau, and I shall never cease to think with pleasure of the magic light, which then fell softly on the illumined shore. The lake itself lay like an emerald shield, and, in the mirror of its peaceful flood, a second town, the counterpart of that upon the bank, appeared to be inverted in a sea of color; while in the sunset sky so many glorious hues were visible, that a great treasure-house of Nature, filled with materials for a million rainbows, appeared to have been broken open, and its prismatic colors scattered broadcast.

LAKE CONSTANCE.

Upon a gently sloping hill above Lake Constance is an old-fashioned, modest country-house, which several times within the present century has stood forth prominently on the political background, not alone of France, but of the whole of Europe. It is the Château of Arenenberg, for years the home of Josephine's daughter, Queen Hortense, and her son Napoleon III.

THE CHÂTEAU OF ARENENBERG.

It was in 1817, while Napoleon was still a captive at St. Helena, that Hortense, exiled from France by the decision of the allied Powers, came to this quiet resting-place, hoping to end her troubled life with a few years of such tranquil happiness, as it had not yet been her fortune to enjoy.

Here, in her exile, that devoted mother welcomed as guests the famous men, who, during the first empire, had filled the world with their renown; and they, in turn, in this comparatively humble home of the ex-Queen of Holland, loved to recall the triumphs of their Emperor, and tell the stories of his wonderful campaigns. This château, therefore, was a school for Louis Napoleon's ambition; and since it was from this, his mother's residence, that he went forth to become President of the French Republic, and finally the acknowledged sovereign of France, Arenenberg may be regarded as the starting-point of that astonishing political cycle, in which Napoleon the Little strove to imitate Napoleon the Great.

One summer, several years ago, I visited this mansion of Napoleonic memories, and was admitted to what had been the boudoir of Queen Hortense. It seemed as if she still must be residing here, for everything recalled her presence. Her portrait hung upon the wall; the writing-desk she used stood in its accustomed place; and near it was the harp her skillful hands had often waked to melody. The musical accomplishments of Hortense were remarkable, and it was she who composed the words and music of that celebrated melody which has become one of the national airs of France: Partant pour la Syrie.

In a pretty chapel near the château is a kneeling marble statue, upon the pedestal of which is the simple inscription, "To Queen Hortense, by her son Napoleon III." There is a look of patient resignation on the sculptured face, well suited to the character of her whom it represents; for her brave and uncomplaining spirit rose above her trials with such heroism as to force admiration of her character even from her enemies. Napoleon frequently exclaimed of her, "Hortense makes me believe in virtue." As a child, she had seen her father die upon the guillotine amid the horrors of the Revolution; a maiden, she had at the command of her mother sacrificed her own affections to a political marriage which had proved one long agony to endure; a mother, she had lost the dearly loved child whom Napoleon intended to make his heir, and whose little life had been the only barrier to the divorce of Josephine; a queen, she had watched the hopes and fortunes of herself and friends go down in ruin with the empire; a daughter, she had seen her mother die broken-hearted at Malmaison, and Napoleon wear out his life in anguish on the barren rock of St. Helena. What wonder, then, that wearied of the past and almost hopeless of the future she often sought relief in prayer?

Leaving the château, I lingered in its pretty garden. Here, seated in the shade of the historic trees whose branches had so often sheltered the daughter and the grandchild of Josephine, I realized the fact that truth is sometimes stranger than the wildest fiction. For, when the star of Napoleon had apparently forever sunk behind the sea-girt rock of St. Helena, a youth, whose only fortune was the fact that he bore his uncle's name, sat here and dreamed of an empire that he would one day rule.

THE GARDEN AT ARENENBERG.

Through intrigue, chance, and the notorious coup d'état of 1851, that dream was realized; but the empire, after enduring twenty years, went down in shame and exile; and now, when all is changed, to this château, so haunted with sad memories, the ex-Empress Eugénie, its present owner, still occasionally comes, to wander sadly through its solitudes, throneless, childless, and a widow.

The Rhine is cosmopolitan. It is not satisfied to linger in a single country. The narrow boundaries of Switzerland cannot contain its rapidly expanding volume. Hence, leaving soon the land of its nativity, it enters Germany, to which thenceforth its splendor and its fame belong. It is, however, changed. Its sojourn in Lake Constance, which is of enormous depth, has had that influence upon the river which education and experience impress upon a youth. Its character, like its river-bed, seems to have deepened and broadened. It moves more steadily and with less uproar and excitement. It has gained power and volume; but it will need them both, for it is about to encounter trial and resistance. As if it had received warning of the approaching struggle, the river, at some distance from the town, seems to be making preparation for the coming conflict. Its waves grow agitated, and its current swifter. A murmur of defiance rises from its depths. Whatever is to be the trial, we plainly see that the young Rhine will meet it like a hero. At last the crisis comes; for, at Schaffhausen, Nature, as if to test the strength of her ambitious child, has reared directly in its path a monstrous ledge of rock, three hundred feet in width. It is useless! With a shout of triumph in its leap for life the Rhine bounds over the cliff, falls eighty-five feet, extricates itself from the seething depths below, shakes from its brow a billion glittering drops, which sparkle in the sun like clouds of diamonds, and sweeps along unharmed and free. It is plain that there has been a conflict. The few remaining rocks that still oppose the river stand like grim veterans who have thus far managed to survive the onset, while scores of their companions have long since disappeared from view, their huge, dismembered bodies buried in the triumphant stream.

But our sympathy is not with them. It is rather with the freedom-seeking Rhine, which will bear no restraint, and hurls itself against the enemy with a roar of anger and a shout of victory that can be heard for miles. Yet, this is not for every traveler a place of romance; or even if it be, the terribly prosaic claims of hunger and of thirst inevitably silence, for a time, his dreams and fancies. Thus, in the hotel register at Schaffhausen are these practical lines, composed by one who certainly did not believe in total abstinence:

"THE FREEDOM-SEEKING RHINE."

“As I stood just now by the Falls of the Rhine,
 I was suddenly seized with a fancy divine;
 And I thought to myself — if these Falls of the Rhine
 Instead of water, were only wine,
 I should certainly choose them for falls of mine.”

A few hours after leaving Schaffhausen, the traveler in Rhineland reaches, by a trifling détour, the former paradise of gamblers, and the still charming health resort, — Baden-Baden.

A GLIMPSE OF BADEN-BADEN.

It were folly to pass this unnoticed. I have been sometimes asked, by persons planning a European tour, “What would you recommend as the best halting-place within the limits of southwestern Germany, if you were pressed for time, and could select but one place on the way to Switzerland?” To such a question I always answer, “Baden-Baden.” It is true, to do so is selecting from a great embarrassment of riches, but I am sure the choice of Baden-Baden will not be regretted. Nevertheless, in judging of a place, how much depends upon the accidents of health and weather! A rainy day, a sleepless night, an insolent waiter, or an attempt at extortion, — any one or all of these may tinge the fairest place with gloom; and, even under favorable circumstances, how many lovely scenes are spoiled for us through some mistake which, if we had been warned of it, might just as well have been avoided! The warning to be given in respect to Baden-Baden is this: Do not select for your abode a hotel far from the music, gaiety, and beauty of its famous park; for that is the centre of its festivities, the spot where the pulse of Baden-

Baden beats most rapidly. To be remote from this, to hear its music merely at a distance, to see the promenaders only when you walk

from your hotel to do so, is quite as undesirable as a poor seat in a theatre, where you discern only a portion of the stage, and lose the language of the actors. But how is one to find a home within this charming neighborhood? This was the question which we asked ourselves on the first morning after our arrival; as, discontented with our rooms, we had approached the park, half tempted to abandon Baden, if we could not secure some situation nearer to this field of mercurment. At length we saw an attractive building, just across the street from it, which did not somehow have the air of a hotel, although two gentlemen were taking breakfast in the garden, and a sleek waiter (the inevitable napkin on his arm) was standing on the steps. Upon the wall, however, was the inscription, "Maison Messmer." "Could we but find rooms here," whispered a member of the party, "we would remain two months, at least." Approaching the waiter, therefore, he inquired, "Pardon me, is this a hotel?" "Ja wohl, mein Herr."

He glanced at us triumphantly, but we discreetly turned away our heads. "Are there any rooms to let at present?"

he continued in a voice which trembled from excitement. "Das glaube ich ganz wohl."

A moment more and the proprietor appeared. Best and kindest of all landlords, we little thought that morning, now so long ago, of the warm friendship which would soon arise between us, strengthened by every annual visit, and undiminished by the lapse of years.

Too modest to proclaim the fact himself, we subsequently learned that he was highly esteemed by old Kaiser William and the Empress, had been the recipient of several presents from them, and was among the guests invited to their golden wedding in Berlin. In fact, it was in this very hotel that both the Kaiser and his wife invariably passed a few weeks every year. Informed of this by the waiter, while Herr Messmer himself had for a moment disappeared, we held a hurried consultation. Could we, by any possibility, remain in this occasional abode of royalty? Would not the prices also be "royal"? They did not prove to be so. Indeed, we soon discovered that, when not occupied by the imperial family, the Maison Messmer was no more expensive than any other hostelry. Accordingly, we hired rooms at once, and stepping out upon our balconies surveyed the scene before us. It was enchanting. On all sides were graceful hills, dark with the splendid foliage of the Black Forest, from which, at frequent opening flowers and the songs of birds, the chill and gloom of Russia's capital.

In the foreground, so near, in fact, that I could toss a coin into it from my balcony, was the Casino Park, lined on one side with an enticing restaurant and the "Conversation House," and on the other with a row of tempting shops. In front of these stood the pretty music - stand, where, three times a day, at early morning, afternoon, and evening, a well-intervals, in striking contrast to their sombre background, emerged, to glitter in the sun, the white walls of some pretty villa. One was the residence of a Russian prince, who, long before the frozen arms of the river Neva release St. Petersburg from their prolonged embrace, forgets here, amid trained orchestra affords enjoyment to attentive listeners. An Oriental sovereign, well versed in pleasures, once decreed that he should always be awakened by music. How often had I thought of that as one of the most exquisite of luxuries, which I should never know! But here, in Baden-Baden, we experienced it. It is a special feature of the Hotel Messmer, which stamps itself indelibly upon the memory. Each morning, about seven o'clock, we would be gradually roused to consciousness by the inspiring harmonies of a German choral; and then, for a full hour, half sleeping, half awake, we would enjoy a concert, just far enough removed to make its strains seem echoes from the realm of dreamland, just near enough to let us lose no portion of its melodies. "But, if the weather be rainy," it may be asked, "are you deprived of music?" By no means. The visitor, in such a case, may leave his hotel balcony and enter the "Conversation House," to find himself in a superbly decorated hall, where dazzling chandeliers rival sunlight, and waxed floors tempt visitors to dance in rhythm to the music of the orchestra, which has come in from the pavilion. Very different, however, was the scene displayed here thirty years ago. The "Conversation House" was then the famous "gambling hell" of Baden, where green baize tables and the fascinating roulette-wheel lured thousands of the butterflies of wealth and fashion to their ruin, like moths to a flame. But now, since gambling is no longer allowed, Baden-Baden has become virtuous by compulsion. Despite its loss, however, the place is still attractive. The beauty of its situation, the healing properties of its springs, its lovely park, and the adjoining forest draw admiring thousands to enjoy the scenery, and listen to the charming music which, hour after hour, floats upon the air. The only persons who told me they regretted the prohibition of gaming were the shop-keepers, who, naturally enough, desire the good old times when fortunes, made or lost in a night, were spent with fabulous rapidity.

One can hardly imagine how gay and animated is the scene on which the tourist gazes from the windows of the Hotel Messmer, especially at night. The long, brilliant avenue is then filled with promenaders, the chairs on either side are occupied, waiters flit about, dispensing light refreshments, and during the pauses in the music the air is filled with the hum of conversation. Seated at such a time upon the private balcony of your room, you look down on that scene, as on the stage from a proscenium box, able to view and listen to it all with perfect ease, and, literally, if you choose, attired in dressing-gown and slippers.

It must be acknowledged, however, that, since the Franco-Prussian War, the gay and fashionable life of Baden has largely disappeared. The place still remains delightful, but it no longer effervesces like champagne. Parisians do not visit it as formerly, and write sarcastically of the change from French to German cus-

oms. One witty writer, for example, says that now, instead of snowy shoulders, sparkling eyes, and charming costumes, one sees here gouty Germans limping along the promenade, supported by their patient fraus, or gathered in the "Conversation House," like cabbages raised under glass; and that, instead of the gay rivalry of spendthrifts, who bought all kinds of trinkets at the shops, the wretched salesmen are once or twice a day aroused from sleep, by some huge-waisted Hollander, who bargains with them half an hour for a pair of stockings! All this, of course, is caricature, yet Baden must have had in former times a charm of which we see few traces now. The loveliest summer toilettes were then inaugurated here. It was the accepted ball-room of all Europe, — the garden of Paris, — the promenade of England. Then, in the balmy summer evenings, these music-haunted paths became the ren-

it is not surprising that such a covered gallery has been provided, where invalids can walk, and wait with patience till the liquid cools. It may perhaps console them to remember that, nearly two thousand years ago, people were doing here precisely the same thing. For when the building was in process of construction, extensive relics of Roman baths were discovered, proving that those old conquerors of the world had learned the efficacy of this spring, and had erected their votive tablets to the gods.

Whenever I was seated at my window in the Hotel Messmer, if I looked off beyond the town, I saw, three miles away, a ruin of enormous size, crowning the summit of a wooded mountain.

It is known as Das alte Schloss, or the Old Castle, and was the residence of the lords of Baden, who in the Middle Ages ruled this region with a rod of iron. Two hundred years ago the French dismantled it, and then, for half a century at least, it lay neglected in the forest solitude. But now a visit to the Old Castle is the favorite excursion to be made from Baden, and every pleasant afternoon, a score of tourists, who have approached it by long walks or drives completely shaded by gigantic trees, may be seen standing on its ruined walls, gazing with delight upon the scene below. The entrance to this castle is a narrow portal beyond which one can see a winding passage, resembling a street in an old Oriental town. The outer gate was only the first of many similar portals which followed one another, like successive doors in a safe-deposit vault. A handful of determined men could easily, therefore, have resisted here an army of invaders; for, in addition to the ponderous gates, the walls were pierced with narrow loop-holes, through which the garrison could with safety fire upon the enemy. To-day, how great the transformation! The massive walls are roofless now, and visitors may enter fearlessly a corridor, which, no doubt, in the period of the castle's glory, frequently echoed to the clang of arms and tramp of horses' feet. watchmen stood guard, a peasant woman keeps a booth of trinkets; and, on an ancient tower, the traveler, wearied by his mountain climb, beholds the touching legend, "Restaurant." It is appropriate that beneath this word there should, also, be inscribed an arrow; for swiftly as a feathered barb does every German, at least, glide through the adjoining doorway to order beer, coffee, butter-brod, and sausage, without which no excursion seems to him complete, nor even an afternoonendurable.

Many war-like deeds are said to have been performed in ancient times in and about the Old Castle, but it is not necessary to go into antiquity for thrilling scenes connected with its history. One day, as we were climbing to the highest portion of the building by some rock-hewn steps, Herr Messmer told us of a tragic incident of which he had been personally cognizant. When gambling prevailed at Baden, almost as many suicides took place in the Black Forest as now occur at Monaco. Among the visitors here, in 1863, were a young Russian officer and the lady of his love. They had eloped from Moscow. Their funds had become exhausted. The money on which the young man counted was refused him, save on condition that he left his friend and came back to his family alone. Unwilling to do this, in his despair the officer tempted fortune at the gaming-table. In vain! In one brief hour he had lost the little money that remained to him. Leaving the brilliant hall, he plunged directly into the Black Forest, and made his way to this castle. It was a glorious night, and moonlight lent enchantment to the place; but its beauty offered him no consolation. Meanwhile, alarmed at his delay, suspecting his design, and acting upon the information given her by a servant, the lady followed breathless in his footsteps. Again and again, in the darkness of the wood, she called his name, but met with no response. At last, when she had dragged her trembling limbs almost to the entrance of the castle, a pistol-shot rang out upon the air. Half-frenzied, with recovered strength, she bounded up the ruined battlements, to find her lover dead beside the wall. She did not hesitate a moment. Pressing a farewell kiss upon his lips, still moist and warm, she took the pistol from his hand and in an instant more fell lifeless by his side.

It is, of course, for the interest of the people of Baden to make the place as beautiful and inviting as possible. Accordingly, the authorities leave nothing undone to render it attractive. In addition to its magnificent bathing establishment, and the Casino Park with its frequent concerts, illuminations, and select entertainments, the town itself resembles a lovely garden, in which a long avenue called the Lichtenthal Allée forms a delightful promenade, adorned with fountains, flowers, and shade trees, among which flows the little river Oos, spanned by a multitude of pretty bridges, and bordered by superb hotels and charming villas. An attempt was once made on this promenade to assassinate old Emperor William. One day, when he was walking here, a miserable wretch sprang from behind a tree, aimed a pistol at him and fired. Instead of hitting him, however, the bullet entered one of the adjoining elms. The tree, in consequence, came very near suffering the fate of the famous willow which overhung Napoleon's grave at St. Helena, — that of being carried away piecemeal by relic hunters. Accordingly, the town authorities encased its trunk in a stout coat of canvas, painted black. But even this did not suffice. The tourists' knives cut through the canvas and attacked the tree. Herr Messmer then suggested the idea of covering the two adjoining trees also with canvas. This plan proved perfectly successful, for strangers, being at a loss to know which tree was the historic elm, gave up all hope of relics, and retired in confusion.

One of the charms of Baden-Baden, which has drawn me thither summer after summer, has been the great variety of forest drives and walks in its vicinity. Thus, within a few hundred feet of the Casino Park, you can enter the Black Forest and stroll for miles beneath imposing trees on paths which, for a considerable distance from the town, are carefully swept every day by old women.

WATERFALL IN THE BLACK FOREST.

It is necessary to see a German forest to comprehend its beauty. Before I went to Germany I had little idea of what a well-kept forest was; but after spending a few delightful days in the Thuringian and Black Forests, the many German songs and poems which describe them were readily understood and heartily appreciated.

IN THE BLACK FOREST.

The Black Forest, for example, on the edge of which Baden-Baden is situated, is ninety miles in length and twenty-five in breadth, and tourists can drive through it on finely graded, macadamized roads, amid thousands of majestic trees, which foresters keep free from underbrush and useless limbs; while, here and there, a ruined monastery or romantic castle cuts its profile sharply on the sombre background. Moreover, trailing in and out, like silver threads among the stately pines, are little streams which fill the air with freshness and the cadence of a song. What wonder, then, that no part of Europe is richer in poetic legends than the Schwarzwald? Books have been written merely to describe them; a hundred castle walls preserve them still in fresco, or in tapestry; and the quaint dwarfs and giants, princesses and fairies, of whom we read with bated breath in childhood, were all of German origin, and usually played their parts for good or ill within the limits of this forest.

It is not long ago that the good, simple-minded people of this region firmly believed that these dark-hued pines were once inhabited by golden-haired sirens, so fair and white that they seemed born of the water-lilies, and that, when the moon-

beams turned by their caress the surface of the rivers to a silver pavement, those fair nymphs danced there-on the whole night long, until the first pale streak of day came glimmering in the east, when they would vanish like a dream. Absurd, of course, these legends seem to-day; yet who will deny that, in a poetic sense at least, the world is poorer by their loss?

THE RUINS OF ALL SAINTS.

Hidden away from the world, in the cool depths of the Black Forest, within the shade of stately trees and within easy distance of some beautiful cascades, is the once famous monastery of All Saints. That all who lived within its walls were saints, I would not venture to affirm; but it was certainly a noble building in its prime, five hundred years ago, and held its place as one of the richest institutions of the kind in Germany. At the very beginning of this century, however, its property was confiscated and the site abandoned. A miserable fortune then awaited the monastery, since it was purchased for a cotton-mill. Apparently the gods protected it from sacrilege; for, on the very day when its new owners were to take possession, the lightning's bolt set fire to the massive edifice and made of it the ruin which we see. No lover of the beautiful, however, can regret it; for now, instead of a prosaic factory, the tourist finds in this delightful spot one of the finest ruins to which luxuriant ivy and romantic legends ever lent their charm.

Soon after leaving Baden-

Baden, another charming feature of the Rhineland greets the traveler in Heidelberg, partially mirrored in the river Neckar, which here rolls downward like a flood of silver to the Rhine some miles away. The great attraction of the place is, of course, its famous castle, which is certainly one of the grandest strongholds ever designed by mediæval architects, and has been enthusiastically called the “Alhambra of Germany.” All German castles are picturesquely located, but few can equal this; for the steep mountain side of Heidelberg is covered with a dense forest, from which, more than three hundred feet above the river, the lovely ruin emerges, like a solitary flower out of a mass of dark green leaves. It is only a short walk from the Castle Hotel to this historic edifice, but it will not be easily forgotten; for the dark woods are threaded with a multitude of winding paths, completely sheltered from the sun, and in the early spring bordered with violets. Sometimes these walks are spanned with ruined arches, adorned with wild flowers, and caressed by the clinging fingers of innumerable vines. Moreover, in these sylvan shades, on every pleasant summer afternoon, the visitor can seat himself in a rustic café (the roof of which is the green canopy of the trees), and listen to orchestral music, that invariable feature of German out-door life, cheering the pilgrimage of the summer tourist in Rhineland with continuous strains of melody.

On entering the courtyard of the castle, we see a great variety of architecture in the buildings that enclose it.

A CORNER IN THE COURTYARD.

Each differs from its neighbor, both in general design and ornamentation, for Heidelberg Castle was not the work of a single architect, or even of one age, but is, rather, a series of palaces built by successive princes during a period of three hundred years. A wonderfully fascinating place is this old courtyard, either at sunset, when its ruined walls, with their elaborate statues and stone-carving, stand out like finely decorated screens against the sky, or, when the moon pours a flood of silver through their ruined arches, giving a glory to their remnants of departed splendor, and softening all traces of the conflict which they still survive. In that mysterious light their sculptured kings and warriors seem like living beings, who have assembled to converse of the old times when the grand halls were filled with valiant knights, fair ladies, and sweet-voiced minstrels.

No one can fail to be impressed with the former strength of the castle's walls, if he observes an enormous mass of masonry called the "overthrown tower." Two hundred years ago, the army of Louis XIV. left the town of Heidelberg a smoldering heap of ruins, and the castle itself so far dismantled, that the French king ordered a medal to be struck, bearing the inscription, "Heidelberg is destroyed." But, happily, it was impossible to destroy such a massive structure, and some of its old battlements remain almost as strong as formerly in their enormous thickness of twenty feet.

A HISTORIC FAÇADE.

The presence of ivy, in connection with the ruins of the past, is one of the most beautiful and suggestive sights in nature. It is also a peculiarity of the North. Egyptian ruins stand in the burning sunlight, desolate and naked, with all the blows they have received from time and their despoilers plainly visible ; but in the lands of mist and snow, ruins are quickly covered with a lovely mantle of protection. How tenderly the ivy touches the broken outlines of their stony features, putting its tiny tendrils forth, like an infant's fingers creeping over a mother's face ! And when the union of the vine and ruin is completed, how sturdily those rootlets cling to every coign of vantage, and enter every nook and cranny, until by the sheer force of numbers their lilliputian hands screen and apparently support the massive walls ! Is it not owing to its ivied cloak that many an ancient structure is more beautiful in ruin than when perfect ? And who can stand by such an edifice, made lovelier by vines which never would have come to it but for misfortune, and not reflect how character is often beautified by adversity, developing in trial a multitude of noble traits which in prosperity would never have been seen? Something is wanting in a man who has not known misfortune. To have really lived one must have suffered.

In the cellar of the castle is the largest wine-cask in the world, which is no less than twenty-four feet high, and has a capacity of more than a quarter of a million bottles of wine. In olden times, when this huge tun had been filled with the produce of the vintage, a dance took place upon the platform that surmounts it, and the old castle walls resounded to gay music, songs, and laughter; but ever since 1769 the cask has held no wine, and the days of Heidelberg's festivities are gone forever.

There are three modes of traveling on the Rhine. The first and fastest is, of course, the railway; but this, while good for business purposes, is rarely taken by the tourist. The second is the steamboat, which is both rapid and agreeable. The third and last is the long line of splendid carriage-roads which wind around the bases of the mountains and skirt the borders of the stream. Ninety-nine out of every hundred travelers, probably, take the steamboat journey, and thus glide rapidly in one day past the famous Rhinish villages and castles; but this is like going through a picture-gallery on roller-skates. There is no time on such a trip really to observe anything. The most delightful way to travel through Rhineland is in a carriage, or on foot. Of this I was convinced, some years ago, in talking with a gentleman who had made such a tour. I had myself sailed up and down the Rhine a number of times, and thought I knew it tolerably well; but when we came to speak of some details, I found that, compared with my companion, I knew very little. "How is this?" I inquired, in some chagrin, when he had asked my impressions of a place I had not seen, "how is it possible that you know the entire route so perfectly?" "It is easily explained," was the reply. "I recently hired a carriage and a pair of horses, and, with my son, drove leisurely along the Rhine for a hundred and fifty miles, having no end of good hotels in which to eat when we were hungry, and sleep when we were weary. Journeying thus, we halted when and where we liked, observed the village life, and visited leisurely the ruins, which, looked on from the steamer at a distance, merely produce a vague impression soon to be forgotten." I contemplated him with admiration, not unmixed with envy. No one could have called him an extensive traveler. He had not been in Egypt, Spain, or even Italy, but he had done at least one thing in Europe thoroughly,—he had seen the Rhine.

The usual starting-point for a sail down the Rhine is Mainz, or, as the French prefer to say, Mayence. This, if not beautiful, is nevertheless a town of great historical celebrity. It was one of the old Roman strongholds built along the Rhine; and,

shortly before the birth of Christ, the Roman general, Drusus, built across the river at this point a bridge of stone. Since then poor Mainz has been repeatedly the spoil of conquerors, from Attila to Bonaparte. Yet, though its annals have been often stained with blood, its greatest fame comes from a very different source. In its chief public square stands a monument and erected by subscriptions from all parts of Europe. It is the statue of the most illustrious citizen of Mainz, John Gutenberg, who here invented movable types, and whose first printing-office, occupied by him in 1443, is still preserved. Unfortunately, like many of the benefactors of his race, Gutenberg died friendless and in want. Nevertheless, among the heroes of the Rhineland, his name stands out in characters that will forevermore command the admiration of posterity; and although Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon, and many lesser warriors have played their rôles in the historic drama of this river, —leaving behind them memories which are now inseparable from the stream itself, — the man, whose life-work revolutionized the world and helped mankind immeasurably onward in its upward path, was one who neither held a sword nor wore a crown.

MAINZ FROM THE BRIDGE.

As the swift steamer bears the tourist down the Rhine from Mainz, a charming feature soon reveals itself in the extensive vineyards glistening in the sun. Sometimes the shores are lined with them for miles. The most renowned and valuable lie upon the slopes of the Johannisberg. This mountain was formerly the property of an Austrian statesman, Metternich.

It is well known that, in addition to his love for vineyards and diplomacy, Metternich had a mania for collecting autographs, and his relations during thirty years with the sovereigns of Europe (some of whom owed to him their crowns) had naturally given him a fine array of royal signatures. Not content with these, however, he solicited those of persons distinguished in any walk of life. Among others, therefore, he requested the autograph of Jules Janin, a famous wit and journalist of Paris. On receiving the request, Janin immediately seized a pen and wrote :

“ Paris, 15th May, 1838. — Received from Prince Metternich, twenty-four bottles of his best Johannisberg wine. (Signed) JULES JANIN.”

The wit was well appreciated and rewarded, for in a month the journalist received from Metternich the two dozen bottles of Johannisberg. It is probable, however, that Metternich kept the signature of the witty Frenchman longer than Janin kept the sparkling wine of Metternich.

Oh, the amount of labor that has been expended on the Rhenish hillsides! Without man's ingenuity, no cultivation of the grape on their steep sides would have been possible. But human skill has changed them into hanging gardens, by means of countless terraces which hold the soil that otherwise would be washed down to the river in a dozen rainstorms. We sometimes think the building of stone walls on old New England farms remarkable, but that is nothing to what has been accomplished on the Rhine. Literally, thousands of miles of carefully constructed and cemented walls, from eight to twenty feet in height, have been built along these hillsides, dividing the whole area into little vineyards (perhaps no more than twenty-five feet wide), which in places rise in thirty or forty terraces to the very summit of the mountains. Sometimes the slope is so precipitous that the soil in which the vines are planted has to be kept in baskets to retain it, and much of the soil, and all the dressing it receives, must be carried up the hills upon the shoulders of the laborers.

Soon after leaving Mainz, we find ourselves within the region of ruined castles, tenanted only by the genii of the past.

From time to time old crumbling walls, or solitary towers, cast their dark silhouettes upon the sky, — some bleak and bare, others concealing their defects with vines and leaves, like Spanish beggars in their tattered mantles.

Many of these castles were formerly the abodes of men who lived by levying duties on the commerce of the river. Like vultures, from their eyries, they watched the boats descend the stream, and if the tribute they demanded was refused them, they promptly attacked the crew, and secured the cargo for themselves.

Among the strongest residences of these robber barons, and even now the largest ruin on the river, is the Rheinfels. Its record is remarkable, for it was the greed and cruelty of the master of this fortress which finally drove his victims to resistance. A league was formed by several Rhenish cities to do away with this unbearable oppression; and under that confederation, the haughty castles one by one went down. It was a bloody task. This stronghold, in particular, withstood a siege of fifteen months and drove back from its battlements an army of twenty-four thousand men; but, finally, its power was destroyed. Nature has charitably thrown over these blood-stained walls a robe of verdure like a mantle of oblivion, and they are now the peaceful home of birds and flowers, which fill the historic courts with song and fragrance. Best of all, the commerce of the Rhine, to-day, sails fearlessly beneath the gloomy towers which threatened once its ruin.

A BIT OF RHINELAND.

Conspicuous among the castles whose towers fling their shadows on the placid bosom of this river is the Rheinstein. Its origin is lost in obscurity, but there is evidence that it has kept watch and ward above the Rhine for at least six hundred years. To-day, it is a summer residence of the German Emperor, and, in accordance with his wish, is kept as far as possible in the old style. The walls, for example, are hung with ancient armor, the windows are of stained glass, great shaggy skins adorn the inlaid floor, and even the furniture is antique, collected from old castles or mediæval convents.

Another prominent ruin attracting one's attention on this journey is the castle of Ehrenfels. It is in reality no older than the Rheinstein, but, in its mutilated condition, it seems much more ancient. On the occasion of my visit, I clambered up a staircase in the tower and looked out through the casements near the top. The guardian of the place was a plump German matron of such ample girth, that she did not venture to follow me up the stairs; fearing perhaps the fate of the watchman's wife, whose home was in the top of one of these narrow towers, and who there grew so stout that she could neither get down the steps, nor out of the window. When, therefore, her husband died his successor was obliged to marry the widow in her prison.

Not far away one sees upon a tongue of land a tall square tower, which, although fully as old as that of Ehrenfels, was handsomely restored in 1856. The curious legend which adheres to it has stamped forever on its walls the title of the "Mouse Tower." For who does not remember the story of Bishop Hatto, who, in a year of famine, locked a multitude of women and children in one of his barns and set it on fire?

EHRENFELS.

"There," he exclaimed, as he saw the flames, "I have burned up a lot of miserable rats that were good for nothing but to eat corn." Hardly had he uttered the words, when a servant came running to him and announced that thousands of rats were coming that way. In terror, the bishop hastened to this tower and, barring every hole and window, thought himself secure; but in vain!

"In at the windows, and in at the door,
And through the walls by thousands they pour,
And down through the ceiling and up through the floor,
From the right and the left, from behind and before,
From within and without, from above and below;
And all at once to the bishop they go.

"They have whetted their teeth against the stones,
And now they pick the bishop's bones;
They gnawed the flesh from every limb;
For they were sent to do judgment on him."

At the union of the Rhine and one of its smaller tributaries, lies a town which the lines of a poetess have made more widely known than almost any other on the river,—“Fair Bingen on the Rhine.” Doubtless the lady’s sketch was imaginary, and the village which she

thus immortalized was probably chosen at random; nevertheless, it is impossible to look upon it without a pitying thought of the “soldier of the legion,” who “lay dying in Algiers”; and as the boat glides by it in its course, one finds himself repeating some of the familiar lines:

“Tell her, the last night of my life (for ere the moon be risen,
My body will be out of pain, my soul be out of prison),
I dreamed I stood with her and saw the yellow sunlight shine
On the vine-clad hills of Bingen — fair Bingen on the Rhine.”

BINGEN.

Just opposite Bingen the glasses of all tourists on the steamer are eagerly turned toward the German National Monument, which stands at a height of seven hundred and forty feet above the river, on the brow of a wooded hill known as the

Niederwald. It is a colossal bronze statue of Germania, designed to keep alive the fires of patriotism by commemorating the German victories in the Franco-Prussian War, which laid the foundation of the present empire. Aside from the impressive memories that it awakens, it is an imposing work of art, for the entire monument is more than one hundred feet in height,—the majestic figure of Germania, holding a crown and sword adorned with laurel wreaths, being itself thirty-three feet high. Around the pedestal are the portraits of Emperor William and the principal princes and generals of Germany, as well as fine reliefs portraying scenes in the campaign; and on the side facing the river, the sculptures represent the “Watch on the Rhine,” the words of the noble song being appropriately inscribed beneath.

The Rhine, in its capricious windings, gives forth its treasures, one after the other, each awakening new delight. Among the pretty villages thus revealed is Bacharach, the most conspicuous feature of which is a ruin known as St. Werner’s

THE NATIONAL MONUMENT.

Chapel. The origin of this building was peculiar. Saint Werner, it appears, was a young boy, who, four centuries and a half ago, was murdered by the Jews at Oberwesel. His body was flung into the river, but, instead of floating down the stream, it came miraculously up the current for some miles, and was finally washed ashore at Bacharach, scaring the murderers into confession. After such an aquatic exploit the young man was declared a saint, and the inhabitants of the town could do no less than build for him the pretty chapel, the ruins of which still grace the borders of the Rhine.

The town of Bacharach has, also, an eventful history. Some eighteen hundred years ago a Roman settlement was established here, and, very early becoming famous for the wine which it produced, it was called Ara Bacchi, of the Altar of Bacchus. Even to-day an altar to the god of wine might well be erected at Bacharach; for, on sipping the golden produce of its vineyards, we seem to taste in every drop a ray of imprisoned sunshine, and recollect the German proverb which declares :

“ At Würzburg on the Stein,
At Hochheim on the Main,
And Bacharach on the Rhine,
You find the best of wine.”

Not far from the town, one sees before him, in the middle of the river, a singularly shaped structure, which certainly can lay no claim to beauty. It has a most inhospitable air, since its entrance is six feet above the rock on which the building stands, and even this is reached only by a ladder. More than six hundred years ago, this structure served as a convenient toll-house, which no boats were allowed to pass without paying tribute, and that it was also used as a prison is evident from the fact that dungeons still exist beneath it, below the level of the river. It was even capable of sustaining a siege, being supplied with water from a well dug deeper than the bed of the surrounding stream.

All the legends of the Rhine are by no means pathetic. Thus, it is claimed that in the castle of Schönberg there once lived seven handsome daughters, who were such incorrigible flirts, and persistently broke so many hearts, that Providence finally interfered to avenge the Romeos of the Rhine, and changed the sisters into seven rocks, which stand here to this day, a warning to all pretty voyagers of the consequences of such cruel actions.

“Of love they ever made a jest,
For a stony heart was in each breast;
Now, sunk in the Rhine for their sins to atone,
They are changed into rock and senseless stone.”

The present generation, however, apparently cares very little for this warning. Providence seems to have changed its method of protecting jilted lovers; else would the shores of Mount Desert and Narragansett Pier be quite impassable for boats.

At one point on the river, German students love to perpetrate a standard joke, at which all travelers have laughed for twenty years, but which still causes merriment. The echo here from either bank is so exceptionally fine, that students often shout the question, “What is the Mayor of Oberwesel?” The echoed answer comes back from the hills, “Esel,” that is to say, “an ass.”

ST. GOAR.

RHEINFELS, NEAR ST. GOAR.

THE LORELEI.

The Rhenish village of St. Goar derives its name from an old saint of the most remarkable character and habits, who flourished here eight hundred years ago. Professionally he was a boatman, and ferried people back and forth across the Rhine; but not content with this, he sought to convert the heathen of this region to Christianity. His methods, however, were peculiar. One day, for example, as he was rowing a traveler across the Rhine, an idea suddenly came to him like an inspiration. Ceasing to row, he asked his passenger if he were a Christian. The man replied that he was not. Whereupon St. Goar immediately rushed upon him, plunged him over the side, and baptized him, ere the astonished man had time to catch his breath. Then, for fear that such a quick conversion might not last, he left him in the Rhine to drown, so that he might go at once to Paradise. The legend adds that, the same night the soul of the drowned man appeared to St. Goar, and, far from reproving him for his rough treatment, thanked him for thus securing to him the joys of Heaven. Thenceforth

THE SIREN'S CLIFF.

the valiant saint doubted no more that baptizing was his vocation, and hardly a day passed without an immersion. It is true, the bishop of the town reproved him for his undue violence, but the saint immediately wrought a miracle by hanging his hat on a sunbeam, and the bishop could not say a word. Nevertheless, this system of compulsory baptism lasted only a short time; for, naturally enough, as soon as his habits became known, each passenger, when in the middle of the stream, would always make the sign of the cross, and swear with chattering teeth that he was a Christian.

At a little distance below St. Goar, the finest scenery on the Rhine reveals itself, where the imposing cliffs of the Lorelei rise, dark and threatening, to the height of four hundred and fifty feet. Combined with beauty here, there used to be, in the days of small boats, dependent merely upon oar and sail, an element of danger. For at this point the Rhine is sometimes turbulent, and in a distance of one hundred yards the inclination of the river-bed is about five feet. Even now, a sunken ledge still makes a whirlpool, dangerous to small craft, unless skillfully managed. The curious legend of the place is, therefore, easily explained; for, in the evening, when the white foam beat against the rocks, and the pale moonbeams rested phantom-like on the frowning cliffs, the peasants fancied they perceived the golden hair and ivory shoulders of a siren who lured poor mariners to their destruction. But now, at all events, the Lorelei has lost her power. A railroad tunnel perforates the rock, the steamboat's whistle drowns the melody of her voice, and she spreads the meshes of her whirlpool-net in vain.

Not far below this siren-haunted cliff, I visited one day two famous ruins, standing side by side, called the Castles of the Brothers. The picture of the Rhine, seen through the crumbling arches, was enchanting, but the old walls were gaunt and bare as skeletons, and their deserted windows called to mind the eyeless sockets of a skull. Their legend is well suited to the place; for, it is said, two brothers once resided here in perfect harmony, until a fatal shadow crossed their path in the form of a mad, unconquerable passion for the same woman. In such a love, appeals to generosity are useless. Neither brother would yield his claim; and upon a narrow ledge between the castles they finally met in mortal combat.

THE CASTLES OF THE BROTHERS.

FALKENBURG.

At the same instant, the sword of his opponent pierced each lover's breast, and the two brothers fell in death, a look of hatred, yet of triumph, on each face.

The massive walls of Falkenburg commemorate a famous bandit of the Rhine, named Falkenstein, who on one occasion looked with envious eyes upon the silver bell of a church, and caused it to be brought to him that he might melt it into coin. The bishop, struck with horror at the sacrilege, went to the castle in his priestly robes to demand its return. At this, Falkenstein burst into a roar of laughter, saying: "You wish to have your bell, do you? Well, you shall have it henceforth forever." Thereupon the bell was tied about the bishop's neck, and both were thrown into the dungeon-well of the tower, and covered with stones to the depth of six feet. A few days afterward Falkenstein fell ill, and when night came, the doctor and astrologer who watched beside his bed heard with terror the knell of the silver bell coming from the depths of the earth. The awful sound continued until midnight, when, at the last stroke of twelve, Falkenstein expired. Since then, as regularly as the anniversary of the desperado's death comes round, it is said the bell can be heard ringing under the ruined castle.

Not far from this point, we approach the confluence of the Rhine and the Mosel, the water of which is as pleasing to the sight, as is to the taste the sparkling Mosel wine produced along its banks. This river, even after uniting with the Rhine, preserves for a long time its emerald color, as though unwilling to mingle its French waters with the waves of Germany. The city of Coblenz which is situated at the union of these streams has an interesting history. Here, eighteen hundred years ago, the Romans founded a city named appropriately Confluentes; and hither, after the death of Charlemagne, his grandsons came to divide between them his gigantic empire. In a military point of view Coblenz is of great importance, and hence is thoroughly protected, not only by its own massive walls and a connected series of strong forts, but also by the mighty citadel of Ehrenbreitstein, just across the Rhine. This stone colossus is defended by four hundred cannon, and is said to contain fifty thousand needle-guns, and stores of provisions capable of maintaining an army of eight thousand men for ten years, while it derives its water from deep wells dug within its own enclosure. Its very name, the Broadstone of Honor, is imposing; and, rising as it does in massive majesty four hundred feet above the river, it seems sufficiently impregnable to deserve the appellation sometimes given it of the "Gibraltar of the Rhine."

The most beautiful feature of Coblenz is the Rhine Promenade, which borders the historic stream for more than two miles. I hardly know a prettier walk in Europe than this river-avenue; for, aside from its charming situation, it is a thing of art and beauty. Far from being a mere promenade, as the name might imply, it is a lovely garden, sloping to the Rhine, kept with the utmost care, shaded by noble trees, carpeted with turf, embellished with statues, fountains, and elaborate flower-beds, and frequently enlivened with choice music. This river-park was designed by the Empress Augusta, who was exceedingly fond of Coblenz, and to her memory a statue has been erected here, which seems to be contemplating with serene satisfaction the scene of beauty called by her into existence.

One evening, as I was strolling on this promenade, watching the stars reflected in the river, and reveling in the peaceful beauty of the place, I suddenly heard in the distance the harmonious voices of some German students singing "The Watch on the Rhine." It was beautifully sung, and I stood spell-bound, listening to the thrilling words which rang out with true manly vigor over the historic stream. I was not, it is true, a German, and hence could not perhaps entirely appreciate the pride and joy therein expressed; but even as a stranger from beyond the sea, I felt the blood stir quickly in my veins, as those rich voices sang beneath the stars:

"While yet one drop of life-blood flows,
The sword shall never know repose;
While yet one arm the shot can pour,
The foe shall never reach thy shore.
Rest, Fatherland, for sons of thine
Shall steadfast keep the Wacht am Rhein."

COBLENZ.

STOLZENFELS.

The castle of Stolzenfels, or Proud Rock, which is set in a frame of foliage, four hundred feet above the river, looks sometimes from the steamer like a castle floating in the air. This picturesque château is said to have been in existence for a thousand years, and we can well believe that such a site could hardly fail to be improved at the earliest opportunity. Even in its present restoration, the old foundation walls were used, and its original form was preserved as far as possible.

Like the Rheinstein, the castle of Stolzenfels is now the property of Emperor William; and here his grandmother, the Empress Augusta, loved to spend a considerable portion of her time. Her choice is easily comprehended; for what more enchanting home could be desired than this, in which to pass some weeks or months in calm retirement? The isolation need not be so great as one would at first suppose; for cities are within easy distance, the railway and the river lie below, while telephone and telegraph wires convey to it, at lightning speed, the news and gossip of the world. Yet, if one wishes it, cent prospect of the Rhine, stretching away for miles to north and south, surpasses the power of language to describe. When traveling in Switzerland, Greece, Italy, or the Rhineland, I have never failed to have with me for immediate reference a little volume of "Childe Harold"; and it was while looking down upon the Rhine from the terrace of Stolzenfels, one summer afternoon, that I appreciated as never before the lines of Byron :

“The river nobly foams and flows,
The charm of this enchanted ground,
And all its thousand turns disclose
Some fresher beauty varying round ;
The haughtiest breast its wish might bound
Through life to dwell delightful here ;
Nor could on earth a spot be found
To nature and to me so dear,
Could thy dear eyes in following mine
Still sweeten more these banks of Rhine.”

Almost directly opposite this castle is the river Lahn, another tributary of the Rhine, upon whose banks, in a charming little valley, is the town of Ems, a pretty watering place, which enjoys a world-wide reputation. Upon the summit of a hill which overlooks the town, the Germans have erected a national monument, surmounted by an eagle; for Ems is closely associated with the nation's history. Not only was it for years a favorite resort of the old Emperor William, but, in 1870, it became the scene of an important political event. It was here that the famous interview occurred between the German Emperor and the French ambassador Benedetti, in which the Kaiser's manner was construed as an affront to the French nation. It was the one thing wanting to precipitate the impending conflict. France instantly declared the war which was to prove so fatal to her; and thus the spark, ignited here at Ems, soon set all Europe in a blaze, and caused Napoleon III. to be, within six months, a prisoner at Cassel, and the Kaiser a conqueror at Versailles. Many stories of the old Emperor's life at Ems are recounted, one of which states that on a certain occasion he paid a visit to an orphan asylum in the neighborhood, and, calling one of the little girls, began to question her. "My little fräulein," he began, taking an orange from his pocket, "can you tell me to what kingdom this belongs?" "To the vegetable kingdom," she replied. "Very good," said the Kaiser. Then, holding up a gold piece, he inquired, "And to what kingdom does this belong?" "To the mineral kingdom," she answered promptly. "Well done!" exclaimed the Emperor. "But now," he added, "to what kingdom do I belong?" The child hesitated. She could not say that her revered Emperor belonged to the animal kingdom. The visitor to Ems, a score of years ago, would often meet, in one of the hotels or on the promenade, a thin-faced, wrinkled man, who was none other than the hero of the Franco-Prussian War, Von Moltke, commander-in-chief of the German army. Unlike the Emperor and Prince Bismarck, he used to travel with extreme simplicity, and unannounced, for he disliked receptions and publicity, and was content with the plainest rooms. His traveling experiences were, therefore, sometimes amusing. One afternoon he entered a hotel at Ems, his satchel in his hand, having preferred to walk the little distance from the station. He wore the dress of a civilian, and looked decidedly travel-worn and dusty. Accordingly, the landlord told the waiter to show the old man to a small room under the eaves. Once there, the waiter produced the usual card, and asked the stranger to inscribe his name and residence. What was the landlord's horror, when he read the words, "Field Marshal Von Moltke, Berlin"! "Ach, mein Gott! what have I done?" exclaimed the wretched man, wringing his hands. "I am ruined!" Rushing upstairs, he begged the marshal to descend. "It is all a mistake," he cried, "a terrible mistake,

I have beautiful rooms for your excellency on the first floor." "What is the price of them?" asked Von Moltke. "Only one hundred francs a day, your excellency." "And the price of this room?" "Oh, a mere trifle, three francs a day." "Then I will stay," replied the marshal, "I am quite comfortable here; and many a time upon the battle-field, I should have been very glad of such a bed as this."

successfully withstood the storms of centuries. It looked to me as I approached it like a roofless chapel, but in reality is an octagonal platform surrounded by seven arches, and supporting seven stone seats on which the princes sat whose privilege it was to choose the Emperor of Germany. Here, then, under the open sky, and overlooking the majestic stream which mirrored it, the seven Electors of the empire used to meet, not only to select their sovereign, but to make laws, issue proclamations, and conclude treaties with foreign nations. It gives one a curious sensation to look upon this simple "seat" and realize how much power was once vested in the men who met here to exalt or dethrone kings. They were in fact the "power behind the throne" and entitled to all royal dignities and honors save the title of majesty. Were they not wise to thus secure the substance and let the shadow go?

The most conspicuous elevations near the Rhine are known as the Seven Mountains. The loftiest of these is the historic Drachenfels, or Dragon's Rock, named from that legendary monster of the Rhine which, in the days when Roman legions came this way, was both the scourge and terror of the region. The memory of this dragon has not been forgotten; for the evil which beasts do, sometimes, lives after them, while "the good is oft interred with their bones." At all events, the castle on this height perpetuates its story, and the red wine which comes from the mountain-side is called by the unappetizing title of the "Dragon's blood."

The legend of the hero, Siegfried, who slew the monster, and became invulnerable by bathing in its blood, has been immortalized in song and story. Another myth, however, makes the slayer of the dragon a woman.

THE DRACHENFELS.

According to this tradition, the savage beast used to descend the mountain every day, like a roaring lion seeking whom he might devour. The Romans, however, resolved to change its mode of life and make it more domestic in its habits. They, therefore, adopted the custom of bringing daily to the dragon's cave some prisoner whom they had seized. One day, among the captives, was a girl so beautiful that two centurions were on the point of fighting a duel to see which of them should claim her as his own, when the Roman general interfered, and said that for the sake of peace, the maiden should be given to neither of them, but should be handed over to the dragon. This decision was much admired in the army, and was by some compared to the judgment of Solomon. The next day, therefore, the victim was led to the dragon's cave. The monster soon appeared. For some time it had been suffering from dyspepsia. The Romans had not always been careful to remove the sandals from the feet of their captives, and these had been as hard for the dragon to digest as railway sandwiches are for us. At the sight, therefore, of this lovely morsel, the dragon howled for joy, and advanced, smacking its lips and rattling its scales like a thousand tambourines. But the young maiden was a Christian, and in the pocket of her polonaise, or whatever article of clothing corresponded to it, she had a crucifix. This she drew forth and displayed to the advancing dragon. At sight of it the huge beast stood for a moment petrified with horror; then, with a roar that made the mountain tremble, it fell back down the cliffs, and was dashed to pieces on the rocks below. Whichever legend we adopt as true, certain it is that the only monster on the Drachenfels to-day is the iron horse, which, though occasionally emitting fire and smoke, is, nevertheless, completely tamed, and in the summer season meekly draws a party of tourists to the summit eighteen times a day. The ancient castle, built more than seven hundred years ago, is now a melancholy ruin, but, since 1883, the mountain has been crowned by a magnificent edifice called the Drachenburg, which is the property of a wealthy German baron.

The view from the summit of the Drachenfels is glorious. The river lies like an avenue of silver, between two limitless expanses of variously colored cultivated fields, traversed by lines of tiny roads resembling wires on a vase of cloisonné, and dotted here and there with white-walled buildings, which in the distance look like children's playthings scattered on a imagine himself contemplating the world from another sphere, and hence can fancy how our earth must look to those removed from all its sordid cares and petty intrigues. For, at that elevation, the towns have dwindled into ant-hills, and human beings rushing to and fro in them, if visible at all, appear like insects; and their ambitions, quarrels, loves, and hates seem hardly more important than the vibrations of a gnat's wings, compared with the sublime ideas of Time and Space, Creation and Eternity, which meet him face to face upon the heights, and show him all that he has lost by lingering so long below.

On the opposite bank of the river from the Drachenfels, and at an elevation of three hundred and fifty feet above the Rhine, stands the ruined tower of Rolandseck, the view from which is almost unsurpassed. Of all the ruins on the river this has, perhaps, the most poetic legend; for it is said to have been built by the brave and handsome Roland, the nephew of Charlemagne. According to one of several stories, he was betrothed to the daughter of the Lord of Drachenfels, the fairest maiden on the Rhine, and they had pledged themselves before God, either to wed each other, or to renounce the world. But ere the nuptials could be celebrated, Roland was summoned by Charlemagne to the war against the Moors. There he accomplished prodigies of valor, and, finally, in the battle of the Pyrénées, was grievously wounded and reported dead. Hearing this news, the broken-hearted maiden, faithful to her vow, entered a convent. One night, however, having regained his health and strength, Roland returned, eager to claim his bride. To his amazement he was told that she was an inmate of a convent on the neighboring island of Nonnenwerth. On hearing this, Roland himself renounced the world, and building a hermitage, lived in full view of the convent for several years. Only once in that time did he see the face of his beloved; and that was when the sisters of the cloister brought her forth for burial. Thenceforth the unhappy prince refused all food, and died with his last glance turned toward the island which thus in life and death had claimed from him his bride.

THE RHINE AND NONNENWERTH.

Upon this island a convent, embowered in trees, still occupies the site of the institution founded centuries ago, and it is said that this historic retreat was conceded to the nuns by Napoleon, through the intercession of Josephine, at the time when all other religious establishments along the Rhine were abolished by the French.

We may smile at the old Rhenish legends as improbable and childish, and yet to the ideas which underlie them the world owes some of those immortal compositions which must no longer be regarded as the "music of the future," but the music of the century. Wagner perceived the strength and beauty of the northern myths and drew from them material for his noblest inspirations. Then, bringing to the Rhine the legendary heroes of the North, he wove about them the enchanting robes of music, poetry, and romance.

The Rhine itself with its eternal movement toward the sea, the changeless calm within its depths, the rhythmic undulation of its surface, the whisper of its wavelets in the rushes, the clamor of its current on the rocks, and the wild fury of its falls, furnished the motive for some of his sublimest passages.

There is, indeed, a power in the Norseland Sagas that makes them masterful and virile; and such conceptions as the Rheingold, the valiant Siegfried, the weird Valkyrie, and the Twilight of the Gods, are better suited to Wagner's music than the more effemi-

In full view of the Seven Mountains lies the pretty city of Bonn, famed for its university of fifteen hundred students. It is a pleasant place in which to spend a few days of the fortnight or three weeks which can be profitably given to a tour in Rhineland; for its hotels are excellent, the surrounding scenery charming, and the excursions to be made from it delightful. Among the celebrated names associated with Bonn are those of the historian Niebuhr and the philosopher Schlegel, who taught in its university; the composer Beethoven, whose birthplace it was; and the poet Arndt, whose noble life here reached its end. To the composer and poet, monuments have been erected, and as I stood before them and reflected on the rarity of men who rise thus from the wilderness of mediocrity, and are thenceforth distinguished evermore from the innumerable nameless dead, I was profoundly convinced of the potency and value of individuality in human history. It was Socrates, not the Athenians, who gave mankind the ideas handed down to us by his disciples Xenophon and Plato; it was Cæsar, not the Roman legions, who conquered Gaul, invaded Britain, vanquished Pompey, and unified the Roman world; it was Frederick the Great, not the Prussian army, who kept at bay the three great European powers for seven years; it was Napoleon, not his marshals, nor even the spirit of the Revolution, who entered nearly every capital as conqueror, created kings, and was the arbiter of Europe for a dozen years. The masses of humanity are like the steppes or prairies of our earth, — extensive, useful, and productive, but painfully monotonous and uniform. The leaders of the race, however, are like mountains which lift their heads toward heaven, discern the future and survey the past, hold converse with each other over the intervening fields and foothills, catch the first promise of the rising sun, reflect it to a darkened world beneath, and finally pass on the solar radiance to more distant peaks, till their refulgent summits seem like a line of torch-bearers encircling the globe.

It is difficult to think of either Shakespeare or Beethoven as a child, and yet the man whose influence in music has been as helpful and inspiring to the race as Shakespeare was in literature, played as a boy in these old streets of Bonn.

Equally remarkable in another way was the poet Arndt, the inspired bard of Germany during the great uprising of the nation against Napoleon. His patriotic songs were then to German hearts what military music is to weary limbs, and his immortal lyric: "What is the German Fatherland?" — "Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland?" — is still almost as popular in Germany as the "Watch on the Rhine." At a time when from all parts of Germany recruits were hurrying to the front, with the one purpose of liberating their country from the oppression

it had borne so long, the following lines were sung upon the march or round their camp-fires, and awakened wonderful enthusiasm and fraternal feeling :

“What is the German’s Fatherland?
The Prussian land? the Swabian land?
Where Rhine’s thick-clustering fruitage gleams?

Where on the Belt the sea-mew screams?

Not these the land;
His is a wider Fatherland.

What is the German’s Fatherland?
Bavarian, or Westphalian land?
Where on the Dunes the wild sand blows?
Or where the Danube brawling flows?
Not these the land;
His is a wider Fatherland.

What is the German’s Fatherland?
Oh, name at length this mighty land!
As wide as sounds the German tongue,
And German hymns to God are sung,
That is, the land;
That, German, name thy Fatherland.

To us this glorious land is given:
O Lord of Hosts, look down from heaven,
And grant us German loyalty,
To love our country faithfully;
To love our land,
Our undivided Fatherland.”

Besides his patriotic songs, Arndt also wrote some pamphlets — notably the “Spirit of the Age” and a “Catechism for Germany's Defenders" — whereby he appealed directly to the purest impulses and noblest sentiments of his countrymen. It is fitting, therefore, that he should have lived, revered and beloved by every one, to the extreme age of ninety years, "a marvel of vitality, faith, and heartiness, — a wonderful old man." His house in Bonn was near the Rhine, and overlooked the river at perhaps the most beautiful portion of its course. On a stone bench by his door old "Father Arndt," as he was called, would sit for hours, gazing upon the Rhine, and musing on the national changes and improvements he had seen and helped to bring about ; and when he died, in 1860, an immense multitude of people followed his body to the grave. He had already marked the place where he desired to be buried, under an oak tree planted by his own hands ; and there, before the grave was closed, one of his own inspiring hymns was sung, and, as the music of its closing words floated away to lose itself above the Rhine, the precious dust of the old patriot was given to the embrace of his beloved Fatherland, which will forever guard it faithfully under the cross of stone which bears his name.

Of all the cities that adorn the splendid panorama of the Rhine, Cologne is both the wealthiest and most renowned. It played a prominent part even in Roman history, and during the Middle Ages was occasionally called the "Rome of the North." Here Trajan received the summons to assume the imperial purple; here Vitellius and Silvanus were proclaimed emperors; and here the latter was murdered by his cohorts. Here, also, in the camp of Germanicus, Agrippina, the mother of Nero, was born, who, in A.D. 51, retaining an affection for her birthplace, established a colony of Roman veterans, to which she gave her name, Colonia Agrippina, — whence the modern name Cologne.

Numerous churches greet the eye as one surveys this city from the Rhine, but its dominant feature is, of course, its glorious cathedral. Those who beheld this building twenty years ago would hardly recognize it now. Then, it resembled the hull of a huge ship without masts, since its great towers lacked completion. For centuries it had remained unfinished, — a splendid promise made to God, but unfulfilled. During six hundred and thirty-two years the mighty monument had grown, little by little; now halting for a generation, now actually retrograding, and very narrowly escaping ruin. Begun in 1248, it was not finished till 1880, when the last stone was finally placed in position; and the completion of the edifice was celebrated in the presence of old Emperor William and nearly all the princes of Germany. At present it has a glory and a majesty that lift it heavenward above all other churches in the world, and make of it a vast stone arch, bridging the stream of time, down which the intervening years have swept on to eternity. It is impossible to gaze on either the exterior or interior of the stupendous edifice without feeling well-nigh crushed by an overpowering realization of the sublime. The spires reach the almost unexampled height of five hundred and twelve feet, which is just equal to the entire length of the cathedral; and the height of the gable in the transept exactly corresponds to the cathedral's width. It is, therefore, the most regular and stupendous Gothic structure in existence, the consummation of grandeur and religion. When one stands at night beside its base, and lets his gaze climb slowly upward over its enormous buttresses and towers, the effect is mountainous, and its architecture appears Alpine in sublimity, the mighty shafts (which seem as solid as the eternal hills yet are as graceful as the elm) rising until their summits vanish in the gloom, like a colossal stairway leading up to heaven. At such a time, when we consider all the numberless details of the vast edifice, in flying-buttresses, statues, gargoyles, turrets, foliage, and fretwork,—each perfect and complete, and wrought in centuries past by men who did their little part, and then passed on, yielding their place to others,—the grand cathedral seems a fitting emblem of the progress of our race, and the lesson which it teaches may be thus interpreted:

“Life is a leaf of paper white,
Whereon each one of us may write
His word or two, and then comes night.
Greatly begin ! though thou have time
But for a line, be that sublime, —
Not failure, but low aim, is crime.”

Moreover, the history of this building is as full of interest as its grand framework is of majesty. The hands of cunning artisans were fashioning its walls two hundred and fifty years before Columbus sailed for the New World. It antedates by fifty years the founding of the Turkish Empire. Kingdoms have risen and fallen, cities and dynasties have flourished and have passed away since the original architect of this cathedral saw its first stone lowered into the place where it has slumbered all these years. And now that the great work is done, and the cross gleams upon its loftiest pinnacle, how sad it seems that its creator's name should be unknown ! For it is his design that has thus triumphed over time and all inferior suggestions for six hundred years. This fact has been accounted for by a legend, which states that the architect was one night walking on the river's bank, despairing of ever achieving his ideal, when Satan suddenly appeared to him and offered him the most magnificent plan, if he would give him in exchange his soul. "Will my name become famous?" asked the artist. "It will forever rank with that of Phidias," was the reply. The architect begged for a night in which to consider the matter, and consulted a cunning priest, who advised him to take the devil's plan for a moment in his hands, and, while conversing, to glance at it and master its details. The artist did so, and then declined to make the bargain. Whereupon Satan, seeing himself outwitted, cried: "You have broken faith with me. So be it. Only remember this, and let it haunt your dying hour, that when this temple shall have been completed after my design, and the whole world is ringing with its praises, your name will be entirely unknown." Whatever we may think of the legend, the architect's reward has certainly been oblivion.

Beyond Cologne, the Rhine sweeps onward like a king whose fame and power are secure. Its life-work is well-nigh accomplished. It has apparently received from the uplifted towers of the old cathedral its absolution and its benediction. What a career it has had since we first beheld it, leaving its cradle in the glacier, clearing Schaffhausen's barrier at a bound, or gliding by the castles on its banks! Once more it calls to mind a human life, but now, a life the sands of which are running low, and whose long drama hastens to completion; for, at its terminus, silently awaiting its inevitable completion, is the open sea.

"THE OPEN SEA."

Disraeli said that life consists of three parts: youth, a delusion; manhood, a struggle; old age, a regret. How true this is of the delusion and the struggle, we all know; but few regrets can sadden a career which, like the noble river we have followed, leaves, after years of progress and beneficence, its finished duties and confining shores for the unbounded ocean of a higher destiny.

THE supreme benefit of travel lies in the priceless recollections which we bring back from our wanderings. Memory is the key that, in our hours of reverie, unlocks hall after hall of happy reminiscences whose number and variety are limited only by the tours we have made. Travel enables us to make the conquest of the world, appreciative observation garners up its harvest, and memory furnishes the feast. The only joys of which we are sure are those of memory. Behind the pleasure of the present lurks the fear of loss; before anticipated happiness lies the dread of disappointment; but joys we have experienced remain in memory beyond the possibility of change.

KING LEOPOLD.

Many experiences in the traveler's life are more enjoyable in retrospect than in reality. Bad weather, illness, accidents, or uncongenial company may sadly mar our happiness in picture-gallery and cathedral, or on lake and mountain-pass; but when, in the leisure of life's autumn, we mentally survey the fields of travel, we find that while the wings of time have scattered the chaff, judgment has winnowed and memory has preserved all that was precious in the golden grain.

A tourist may return from travel penniless, yet be a mental millionaire; while some illiterate Cræsus, who has never visited the shrines of Nature, Art, and History is, in the realm of memory, a bankrupt. For the enthusiastic traveler a word, a sound, a perfume, or a picture may, like the fabled touch of Midas, transmute the most prosaic substance into gold. Oh, the joy of it! To have a simple strain of music bring before us moonlit evenings on the Grand Canal, a roseate cloud recall the Alpen-glow upon Mont Blanc, a passing Japanese remind us of the sacred grove of Nikko, the rhythm of a waltz transport us to the Danube, the tawny sand within an hour-glass hint of the Sahara, and the rich fragrance of a Jacqueminot suggest the rose garden where blooms in fadeless beauty that perfect flower of architecture,—the Taj Mahal.

For those whose memories cannot be awakened thus, Art furnishes the more direct suggestion of the photograph. The sun has now become man's slave, and through its subtile agency the wonders of the world are printed with infallible accuracy, and multiplied so easily that the humblest village of a civilized country possesses sun-etched reproductions of fine scenery and works of art, just as a wayside pool may hold within its shallow breast the beautiful reflection of a cloudless sky.

The benefits of travel — who can doubt them? It were as foolish to deny the good results of reading. What is the whole world but an open book, whose author is Almighty God, and on the pages of which have been written more or less distinctly stories of the various races of humanity?

I am profoundly grateful for the irrepresentable longing to visit the Old World that made my childhood one long dream of history and

At any moment, I can walk in fancy through the picture-gallery of memory, and see countless landscapes tinted by the

suns of many lands. With slower pulse and calmer heart, I feel the youthful eagerness for sight-seeing and adventure gradually changing into a profound contentment, born of the knowledge that the mental pictures, gathered through a score of years, cannot be taken from me, and are destined to remain, fadeless and indestructible while life shall last. No vandal hand can mar my inner vision of the Himalayas. Saint

Peter's dome may be destroyed by fire, but I shall see it still in its perfection. No dust can gather on the scenes I follow with closed eyes, as memory deftly draws the curtain of imagination and unfolds the panorama of the past. In castle or cottage, wealth or poverty, my treasures will not leave me; and in my easy chair I make the tour of the world upon the wings of thought with perfect ease, floating on waters which lave distant shores; tracing familiar mountains in the sunset clouds; kneeling in temple, church, or mosque; drifting through tropic seas; climbing the cones of Popocatepetl and Vesuvius; and watching either the sudden disappearance of the sun beneath the desert sands, or its persistent brilliancy at midnight in the Arctic sky.

Among the many scenes thus happily recalled, few are more interesting than those connected with the Netherlands. For centuries Belgium and Holland have been called the Low Countries; but their deficiency in altitude has not consigned them to obscurity. On the contrary, if valiant men, fine arts, and famous deeds are made the test of greatness, few countries in the world are so conspicuous in the light of history. Compared with the leading European nations of this century, the Netherlands are at present insignificant, and it is not improbable that they will, ultimately, be absorbed by France and Germany, which stand continually ready to appropriate them. To-day, however, "lying low" in their small, quiet corner of the Continent, they form a most attractive place of sojourn for the traveler; as, in a picture-gallery, we sometimes turn from the large halls display of famous paintings, to cabinet, where dainty miniature or exquisitely finished art-works afford a combination of rare pleasure with their bewildering enter a charming little cloisonné faience, studies afford a combination and a sense of rest.

The Belgians evidently love their native land; for there is comparatively little emigration from it, and none of the other European countries equals Belgium in density of population (the average being about four hundred and eighty-five to the square mile), while villages and cities are so thickly strewn upon its fertile surface that Philip II. said the whole country was only one large town. Of Holland Philip was less complimentary, since he called it "the country nearest hell."

The inhabitants of Belgium are composed of two distinct races, almost as different from each other in racial characteristics as are the Germans from the French. The northern provinces, bordering mainly on the North Sea, are inhabited by the Flemings, a sturdy, blue-eyed, fair-haired people of Teutonic origin, somewhat akin to the Dutch. In fact, the language spoken by them closely resembles that of Holland, and the Dutch and Flemish read each other's newspapers, although they cannot very well understand each other's conversation. In this portion of Belgium — which constitutes the real Flanders — are located the interesting old cities, Bruges and Ghent, as well as the great seaport, Antwerp; but, aside from the important commercial interests of the latter city and the lace-making of Ghent and Bruges, the population of these provinces is mainly engaged in agriculture.

In southern Belgium, however, which is the manufacturing part of the kingdom, lives an entirely different people known as the Walloons. They are descendants of the Gauls, and are, as a rule, of a high-strung nervous temperament, with dark complexions and lively dispositions, like the French. These people speak not only French, but a dialect of the French language, known as the Walloon, which more closely resembles the old provençal of southern France than does the modern French itself.

The splendid cities and prosperous towns in these Walloon provinces of Belgium, full of industrial life and enterprise, and inhabited by thrifty, pleasure-loving people, are profoundly interesting and attractive, and the exquisite beauty and charm of their river valleys and wooded hills, dotted here and there with a stately castle, leave ineffaceable impressions on the memory.

A FLEMISH FAMILY.

It is strange that two such dissimilar races as the phlegmatic Flemish farmers and the light-hearted Walloon workmen should coalesce and form a homogeneous people; yet such is the fact. The Flemish element is the larger, constituting about four-sevenths of the population, and is devoutly Roman Catholic in religion and conservative in politics; while, on the other hand, the Walloons are usually very liberal in their political and religious views. Yet the two races make a happy, contented people, and meet on common ground in the beautiful capital, Brussels, where each is represented in all branches of the administration, as well as in the courts of justice and the two Houses of Parliament.

Brussels, the capital of Belgium, is often called a miniature Paris. In fact, a traveler suddenly transported thither would hardly know that he was not in some retired section of the French metropolis. The same language is spoken in Brussels as in Paris; similar street signs greet us everywhere; the creamy color of the buildings is analogous to that which makes the city of the Seine so light and cheerful in appearance; the style of architecture, also, in both cities is nearly identical; and even the shops, cafés, and covered passageways in Brussels are thoroughly Parisian in appearance. Friends who have lived in this bright city of the Belgians assure me that it is far superior, as a place of residence, to many larger Continental capitals; and it is therefore singular that Englishmen and Americans who wish to spend considerable time abroad, in order to perfect themselves in the French language, almost invariably go to Paris, where the large English-speaking colony and the incessant whirl of gaiety make serious study well-nigh impossible.

The central situation of Brussels, also, renders it very advantageous as a place of sojourn. London, Paris, Berlin, and Berne are about equally distant from the Belgian metropolis, which may in consequence be likened to the hub of a wheel, upon the outer rim of which some of the principal European cities are located.

Many travelers consider Brussels the third handsomest capital in Europe, ranking it after Paris and Vienna. Certain it is, that with its miles of superb boulevards, shaded by noble trees and flanked by magnificent modern residences; its splendidly constructed pavements, washed and swept every night with characteristic Flemish cleanliness; its Palace of Justice, Conservatory of Music, Museum of the Fine Arts, and palatial Bourse, in addition to its venerable Cathedral of St. Gudule, the Hôtel de Ville, and other noble edifices of the past, it has few rivals among the leading cities of the world.

The most interesting square in the Belgian capital is the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville. Its history is almost identical with that of Brussels; for hardly one remarkable event in the annals of the city has lacked this area for its scene of action. What memories, therefore, cluster round the venerable buildings which front upon it.

On one side stands that beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture, known as the Hôtel de Ville, which still appears almost as stately and imposing as when its richly decorated walls sent back in noisy echoes the revelry of brilliant tournaments, or cast its shadow like a pall upon some cruel execution in the square below. This noble edifice suffered severely during the bombardment of the city by Louis XIV., in 1695, but the injured portions have been carefully restored after the original designs, and the result is one of the finest monuments. The most interesting apartment in this historic City Hall is the large banquet-room, which is adorned with fine oak carvings, and has a ceiling remarkable for the splendor of its ornamentation. It was here, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, that the rich Flemish burghers and the powerful Guilds of Brussels used to entertain, with proverbial hospitality, the kings, dukes, princes, and ambassadors who came to them from other lands. Nor is Belgian hospitality a thing of the past. In 1890 when Henry M. Stanley was a guest of the King of Belgium, immediately after the explorer's return from his last trip through Africa, the Mayor and Aldermen of Brussels gave a grand dinner in his honor in this ancient banquet-room. It was a most interesting scene; for there were gathered here, to meet the famous traveler, the ministers of England, France, the United States, and other great Powers, together with representatives of the highest Belgian nobility, and the leading men in the professional and literary life of the kingdom. Meantime, looking down on these distinguished guests were the stern, impressive faces of William the Silent, Maurice of Orange, Grotius, Egmont, Hoorn, and other Dutch and Flemish heroes, whose noble portraits in Gobelin tapestry adorn the sombre walls.

On the other sides of the Grand Place, as it is often called, are still to be seen a number of imposing buildings, constructed three or four centuries ago, yet well-preserved, with elaborate façades and Gothic roofs; and these, together with the Hôtel de Ville, are eloquent reminders of the days when the rich and powerful

Flemish Guilds governed all Flanders, and brought their country to as high a position in respect to manufactures, military prowess, material prosperity, and the fine arts as was attained by any European nation of that age.

One of the most curious and interesting of these buildings is known as the House of the King. This name, however, did not indicate a residence of royalty, in the usual sense of the term, but merely signified the official residence of the King of the Guilds, who, as the Chief of the Municipality, lived here and entertained with sumptuous hospitality the city's guests; for the liberty-loving Flemings held only a nominal allegiance to the House of Austria, and practically knew no other king than the chosen sovereign of their industrial Unions. Even now in the active life of Brussels the Grand Place still holds a prominent position. It is not only the centre of all business pertaining to the Municipality, but it is also the site of some of the most interesting temporary markets that are held in the city. Once a week, for example, from six to nine o'clock in the morning, there will be found within this area a great bird market, when hundreds of canaries, nightingales, mockingbirds, thrushes, and parrots may be seen flitting about in their cages, chirping, singing, whistling, and filling the air with almost deafening, yet melodious, sounds. On such occasions, the square is chiefly occupied by the shrewd, jovial Flemish and Walloon peasant women, who are often somewhat boastful in their eagerness to exchange the silvery notes of their feathered songsters for the musical clink of silver coins. Twice a week, also, at the same hours, there is held here a flower market, and the whole square becomes fragrant with the perfume of exquisite roses, carnations, and other floral products brought in enormous quantities from the country districts. A visit to either of these markets, on a bright spring morning, is a charming experience, and gives a picture of the industrious habits, and the happy and contented life of the people, that will never fade from memory.

On one side of the Grand Place, in front of the House of the King, stood—until recently, when it was removed to a highly ornamented city park—an impressive monument commemorating the illustrious heroes of the Netherlands, Counts Egmont and Hoorn, who, on the 5th of June, 1568, were executed here by order of the Duke of Alva. These men, though Roman Catholics by birth and faith, had steadfastly opposed the cruel persecution of their countrymen by Philip II., and were on this account condemned to death. The execution of Egmont was unusually revolting, even for that age of pitiless severity, since it revealed the most shameful treachery and the blackest ingratitude on the part of the Spanish king. Count Philip Egmont was one of the loftiest types of knightly chivalry and soldierly character that Europe ever produced, and he won for his ungrateful sovereign, in a desperate conflict with the marshaled hosts of France, the brilliant victory of St. Quentin, in honor of which Philip had built the Escorial in Spain. Hence Egmont's military renown and distinguished bravery were the pride of the Flemish race. William of Orange, his devoted friend, had repeatedly warned him of the treachery of Philip, and implored him to escape. But Egmont trusted both the Spanish sovereign and his perfidious agent, Alva, forgetting the popular proverb in regard to the former, "His dagger follows close upon his smile." When told of his inevitable doom, Egmont, despite his well-known courage, was for a moment overwhelmed with horror and surprise, and exclaimed, "Alas! when I should think of God alone, I am unable to forget my wife and children." Then, recovering his composure, he remained calm and self-controlled until his death. A moment of profound silence succeeded the executioner's fatal stroke. Tears filled the eyes of many of the Spanish soldiers; for they had admired Egmont as a gallant warrior. The French ambassador, as he gazed upon the scene from a neighboring window, whispered: "There falls the head before which France has trembled twice." As for the people, notwithstanding the presence of the troops, they could not be restrained; and, rushing to the fatal block, they dipped their handkerchiefs in Egmont's blood, to thenceforth keep them as memorials of the crime, and as incentives to a terrible revenge.

GODFREY DE BOUILLON.

The monument erected to the memory of Egmont and to that of his loyal friend, Count Hoorn, is a reminder of the fact (too frequently forgotten) that, in the valorous resistance made by the Dutch against the cruel and colossal power of Spain, the Belgians joined with equal ardor and self-sacrifice; and, although not as successful as their neighbors, furnished nevertheless some of the grandest leaders in that mighty struggle, and many of the noblest martyrs to the sacred cause. The Flemish provinces, being easily reached, were quickly overrun by the well-trained troops of Spain, and consequently the Flemish people never had the same opportunities as the Hollanders for achieving victory; but Counts Egmont and Hoorn, together with many other brave compatriots, fully shared with William of Orange and Louis of Nassau the dangers and privations of that terrible war, and their immortal names are held to-day in solemn reverence throughout the realm.

Among the prettiest features of Brussels is the Place Royale, where one looks out from his hotel upon a handsome square, adorned with the equestrian statue of Godfrey de Bouillon, the hero of the first crusade. Brussels, like Paris, is not merely a gay, modern city; it has a background of impressive history. This statue, for example, represents the old crusader in the attitude which he assumed when, on this very spot, in 1097, he raised the standard of the Cross, and urged his fellow-countrymen to follow him to Palestine to rescue from the Saracens the sepulchre of Christ.

What an age of enthusiasm was that when such appeals drew multitudes away from home and kindred, to march thousands of miles, through endless difficulties and with no pecuniary recompense, to fight with desperate courage for an idea! It was the age that built cathedrals and worshiped God in forests made of stone; the age of chivalry, born of a reverence for the Madonna, which made all womanhood appear divine; and, above all, an age of sentiment, like that which caused the hero Godfrey, when elected King of Jerusalem, to refuse to wear a crown of gold in the city where his Saviour had worn a crown of thorns. Those days are gone. Cathedrals and crusaders would now be anachronisms. The ladies for whose glances mailed knights contended in the tournament, or on the tented field, have been succeeded by the "New Woman." The narrow, mediæval river of intolerance, curbed by the granite walls of dogma (and hence impetuous in its pent-up fury) has reached the open sea whose waves touch distant shores, and whose horizon steadily recedes as we advance. We can no more go back to the old age of simple faith and ardent zeal, than can the stream return from the broad ocean to its mountain channel; and yet, we sigh for something we have lost, and with an irrepressible yearning for a resurrection of enthusiastic faith and feeling, we agree with Holmes that "it is faith in something, and enthusiasm for something, that makes a life worth looking at."

One of the finest modern buildings in the Belgian capital is the Bourse, which was completed in 1774 at a cost of a million dollars. It seemed to me, at first, incredible that such an elegant edifice, elaborately adorned with Corinthian columns, allegorical statues, and beautiful reliefs, could be merely the Stock Exchange; yet it is characteristic of the city. Brussels is wealthy. Belgium is progressive. It cannot boast of an extensive territory, but it is determined to make the little that it does possess not only prosperous but beautiful. As an illustration of its enterprise, it is worthy of note that this most densely populated country in Europe was the first on the Continent to establish a system of railways.

The tourist in Belgium may well ask himself, therefore, "In the present condition of Europe is not a small, well-governed monarchy like this much better off than larger ones which must maintain enormous standing armies, and are continually fearing war?" The policy of Belgium seems to be: "Let others shake the tree; I will pick up the fruit."

The splendor of the Brussels Bourse is now surpassed by that of the new Palace of Justice, the cost of which was more than ten million dollars. It would be difficult to find in any city a secular building more magnificent and imposing. It forms an enormous rectangle, each side six hundred feet, while in the centre rises a well-proportioned tower, four hundred feet in height. The question naturally suggests itself: How there can be in such a tiny realm as Belgium enough judicial business to make so huge a striking illustration of the European nations have been necessary. It is a fact that while the other European nations have been wasting life and treasure on the battle-field, or carrying enormous burdens in preparation for war, Belgium has been employed in peaceful industries, and the most splendid and conspicuous building in her capital, today, is not an arsenal for her soldiers, nor even a fortress for defense, but a palatial temple for the goddess of justice.

Almost every European capital is embellished by at least one lofty shaft, characteristic of the nation and commemorative of its history. In London, it is Nelson's column in Trafalgar Square; in Paris, the Napoleonic column in the Place Vendôme; Berlin is dominated by her recent Monument of Victory; and in St. Petersburg we find the noble monolith which bears the name of Alexander I. The Belgian capital, also, has a historic column, worthy to be compared with those of other lands. It was erected to commemorate the founding of the kingdom in 1831, when its present liberal constitution was adopted, and Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg was elected king. A statue of this sovereign (the father of the reigning monarch) crowns the summit of the column at a height of two hundred and eighty-five feet; and at the corners of the pedestal are four bronze figures, which symbolize the basic principles of the government: Liberty of the Press, Liberty of Education, Liberty of Public Assemblage, and Freedom of Religious Worship. These are four elements from which we might expect an almost perfect state to be constructed; and where in Europe (all things considered) can we find a nation better governed, a constitution more implicitly obeyed, a king more liberal and progressive, and a people happier and more prosperous?

Leopold II. of Belgium is distinguished among other sovereigns of Europe for his unassuming manners and industrious habits, as well as for the remarkable ability with which he conducts the onerous and responsible duties of his high position. I have been told by those who are well informed that he is the busiest man in his kingdom. He usually rises before six in the morning, and may be seen soon after superintending the rebuilding of his beautiful Château of Laeken, recently destroyed by fire, or consulting with his chief gardener over the rare plants and flowers cultivated in his superb conservatory. At nine o'clock he is in the palace at Brussels, and during the entire day is deeply engrossed in the affairs of State: examining voluminous reports, consulting with his cabinet officers, receiving visits from ambassadors and other distinguished people, making plans for the amelioration of the inhabitants of his Congo-State, and for the development of its commercial life; or employed in the many details which demand the close attention of an enlightened and progressive ruler, desirous of securing the prosperity of his country and the welfare of his people. A brilliant diplomat, a shrewd, far-seeing statesman, liberal in all his ideas of government and administration, thoroughly in sympathy with the progressive ideas of the century, and sharing the hopes and aspirations of his people, King Leopold II. stands out conspicuous as one of the most eminent sovereigns of his time.

The Château of Laeken, the King's summer home, situated about three miles from Brussels, was, a few years ago, destroyed by fire. It was a most beautiful residence, and during the time when Belgium constituted a part of the Empire of France, under the first Napoleon, it was a favorite abode of the Emperor when he visited that part of his dominions. A friend of mine was recently honored with an invitation to dine and, after the repast, as the King and Queen were strolling with their guests through some of the most interesting rooms of the château, Leopold II. suddenly stopped, and recalled a very interesting room and from that little the downfall of Napoleon. building was doomed, and knowing how highly Leopold II. prized the Napoleon table, made extraordinary efforts to force their way into the building through fire, smoke, and falling timbers to secure it, and, finally, to the great delight of the King, succeeded in rescuing it before it had been injured.

THE QUEEN OF BELGIUM.

The Queen of Belgium is a Princess of the House of Hapsburg, and like most of the ladies of her family is a famous horsewoman. In fact, for many years she was in the habit of herself breaking in the wild Hungarian horses brought to Brussels for her use. When "Buffalo Bill" with his troop of Cowboys and Indians was in Belgium, in 1891, he gave entertainments in Brussels for two weeks, and the Queen, accompanied by a large number of the nobility, attended several of his exhibitions. Before leaving Brussels, Colonel Cody with a few friends obtained the privilege of visiting the superb Winter Garden of the King at Laeken. After spending two hours very pleasantly in this conservatory, which is one of the finest in Europe, as they were about to leave, they saw the Queen approaching, accompanied by officers and ladies of her suite. She graciously asked the gallant scout if he would not like to see her stables and horses, and on receiving an affirmative reply, this democratic sovereign personally conducted the party through her royal stables, going into the stalls herself, leading out her favorite thoroughbreds, commenting on their fine points, and in every way showing her intimate knowledge of horses and horsemanship.

This reference to "Buffalo Bill" and his associations with royalty recalls an amusing circumstance connected with the visit made to Berlin by this distinguished representative of American frontier life. It happened that at the time of Colonel Cody's advent into the capital of Germany, old Emperor William was entertaining there three kings of the smaller Germanic powers. One feature of "Buffalo Bill's" performance is the exhibition of the antiquated Deadwood coach, containing passengers who are attacked by Indians and rescued by Cowboys. The Kaiser asked to be allowed to ride in this vehicle

with his royal guests, and participate in this interesting experience.

The request was of course granted, and when the coach was fiercely assailed by howling Indians, its inmates were as usual saved by the gallant Cowboys.

After it was over, and as the royal party was descending from the coach, the Emperor remarked,

"Colonel Cody, I don't suppose this is the first time that you have held four kings?" "No, your Majesty," replied the quick-witted scout, "you are right, but it is the first occasion that I ever held four kings and the royal joker at the same time."

The level plains of Belgium have furnished Europe with its battle-fields for many centuries. From the time of the Franks under Clovis, down to the siege of Antwerp, in 1830, the wars of western Europe have, to a large extent, been fought out in Flanders. Within a radius of fifty miles of Brussels there are at least twenty-five broad plains, which offer admirable ground for the maneuvering of large armies. Hence, notwithstanding the fact that the neutrality of Belgium is guaranteed by the five great Powers, the Belgian government is so fearful lest this little country should be invaded either from the East or West, in case of war between France and Germany, that, of late years, it has constructed along the Meuse and Sambre a continuous line of powerful steel forts, in order to defend the country and to protect its neutrality. These forts somewhat resemble our turret monitors, being manipulated by powerful machinery which causes them to disappear below the surface of the ground after discharging their tremendous guns.

NAMUR ON THE SAMBRE.

They are well located at strategic points along the two rivers, and, in case of war, would prove a serious obstacle to an invading army. They were designed by the distinguished Belgian military engineer, General Brialmont, who, a few years ago, was sent for by the Sultan to plan extensive fortifications along the Dardanelles, and whose works on modern defenses are used as text-books in our artillery school at Fortress Monroe.

The question, whether it would be possible to preserve the neutrality of Belgium in case of war between France and some other Continental Power, is extremely interesting. It is well understood that this neutrality has been guaranteed by England, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria; yet, from a military standpoint, it is also clear that the powerful armies likely to be organized upon its borders, in case of war, would be compelled to enter Belgium in order to secure a position in which to attack each other. The fact is not generally known that at the outbreak of hostilities between France and Germany, in 1870, each of these Powers was promptly informed by the English government that, when the army entered the terri-first soldier of either tory of Belgium with hostile intent, Great Britain would immediately intervene with her entire land and sea forces. Still, notwithstanding the well-known views of England on this subject, and the policy she would be likely to pursue to maintain Belgian neutrality, I recently heard a distinguished European diplomat say that if war should break out between France and Germany, the neutrality of neither Belgium nor Switzerland would be respected by either of the contending forces; that the violation of neutral rights would be absolutely required by the necessities of the situation; and that the contending armies would undoubtedly be obliged to pass through one or both of these neutral countries, or possibly even to fight on their soil.

The battle-ground in Belgium which is of most importance in the history of Europe is that of Waterloo. It is situated about thirty miles from Brussels, and can be easily reached by rail, or by a coach which leaves the city every morning for the battle-field, returning in the afternoon. The best advice that I can give a tourist who wishes to see Waterloo with either pleasure or profit, is to hire one of the local guides, in order to escape their importunity, and then to pay him something extra to keep silent. A few questions about the topography of the country and the positions of the armies will naturally be asked, and will receive intelligent replies; but the abominable "story of the battle" which ignorant guides narrate, with changes suited to the nationality of the visitor, is exasperating. Hard, indeed is the fate of the tourist who is conducted over the scene of conflict with a company of strangers, whose inappropriate remarks and vehement arguments are particularly annoying at such a time.

LA BELLE ALLIANCE.

HEROES' MOUND, WATERLOO.

Waterloo is a place for reverie and solitude; and to behold it with a crowd of uncongenial travelers, or even with a loquacious guide who glibly states, as facts, things which have been disputed by the greatest military students of the world, is a misfortune. My first visit to Waterloo was spoiled by just such circumstances, and I have never ceased to regret it.

The battle-field of Marathon, in Greece, on the contrary, in its sublime and solemn isolation between the mountains and the sea, is almost an ideal spot for a poet, scholar, or historian, and the memory of a day passed there beside its "Heroes' Mound" is one of the most satisfactory experiences of my life.

There is also a Heroes' Mound at Waterloo. Two hundred feet in height, and surmounted by a colossal lion, it dominates the landscape from afar, and marks the centre of the battle-field. Most travelers do nothing more at Waterloo than climb the mound and take a general view of the historic plain; but the ideal way to see the place where was, at last, decisively concluded the duel between Napoleon and United Europe, is to drive in a private carriage to its principal points of interest, and leisurely, and with appreciative study, to inspect such objects as the farmhouse of La Belle Alliance, where the Emperor had his headquarters; the site of the sunken road which proved the grave of hundreds of Napoleon's cavalry; the farm of La Haye Sainte, taken and retaken three times on that eventful day; and, above all, the old Château of Hougomont, against the thick stone walls of which the reckless fury of the French attack hurled itself desperately all day long, only to break in vain on the unyielding ramparts, like billows upon a rocky coast.

It is not necessary to recount the thrilling story of the battle. It has been told in every language of the civilized world, and many volumes have been written in explanation of its strategy and its result. Suffice it here to say, the plans of the two commanders were simple. That of Wellington was to hold his ground until the Prussians under Blücher should join him; that of Napoleon was to defeat the English before the Prussians could arrive, and then to annihilate Blücher. To this end, he had dispatched Marshal Grouchy, with thirty thousand men, to keep the Prussian army in check till he had finished with the English. By a strange fatality, therefore, the issue of the conflict was destined to rest ultimately not with Napoleon and Wellington, but with Grouchy and Blücher. In this tremendous crisis, the Frenchman failed; the Prussian succeeded.

THE CLOSE OF THE BATTLE.

Just as it was evident that the troops of Wellington, if unaided, were doomed to defeat, the force of Blücher arrived upon the field. It was half-past seven o'clock, and twilight was approaching. The French were now outnumbered by fifty thousand men. The destinies of Europe hung in the balance. Napoleon's fate depended on the charge of the Old Guard. Approaching these companions in so many glorious victories, the Emperor uttered, for the last time, the words, "La Garde, En avant!" The veterans were commanded by Marshal Ney, the "Bravest of the Brave," who, having already had five horses shot under him, now advanced on foot. The heroes turned a farewell glance toward their loved Emperor. Like the old gladiators of the Colosseum, they might have cried, "O, Cæsar, we, who are about to die, salute thee!" For soon, beneath a deadly cross-fire of shot and shell, they seemed to melt like frost-work in the sun. The rest of the army gave way; a mortal pallor overspread Napoleon's face, and he attempted to ride on to death. But he was pushed back by his officers; and one of them, grasping the bridle of his horse, led him at full gallop from the first overwhelming defeat that he had ever known.

"Be sure and stop at Ghent," a friend had said to us as we were leaving Brussels, "if you would see a genuine Flemish city of the olden time." When we beheld its picturesque old gateway, we rejoiced that we had taken his advice; for its

pointed towers, pierced with narrow loopholes, and its gabled roof, rising like flights of steps to the high station of the sentinels, still fling their shadows across the ancient moat, just as they did when Ghent was the proud capital of Flanders, and from out this gate the warlike Ghentians marched to rout the English army under Edward I.

THE GATE, GHENT.

STATUE OF ARTEVELDE.

Especially interesting, from its historic associations, is the old market-place of Ghent, the forum of the Flemish capital. Here, homage was paid to the Counts of Flanders in a magnificence of style, rare at the present day even to royalty; and here, during the civil feuds, which were as desperate in Ghent as in mediæval Florence, the different factions would assemble, fierce to avenge some real or fancied violation of their rights. In one such contest alone fifteen hundred men were slain.

The statue in the centre of this square is that of Jacques Van Artevelde, the celebrated Brewer of Ghent, who, though of noble family, enrolled himself in the Guild of Brewers, that he might thus obtain the favor of the lower classes. Rich, eloquent, and able, he quickly rose to be for eight years the virtual sovereign of Flanders, putting to death or banishing those who ventured to oppose him, and filling all the offices with men obedient to his will; yet, near this square, where, with uplifted arm he had so often roused the populace to further his designs, he was at last assassinated by the very men who, while admiring his genius, would not brook his despotism.

Leaving this historic site, a short walk brought us to the oldest church in Ghent, founded nine hundred years ago. Around its base, like barnacles upon a stately ship, have gathered several small shops, which should be cleared away; but, in spite of these, the building has a rugged grandeur suited to its history. Its pointed turrets were already old when, in the time of the Crusaders, a Flemish Count brought back to decorate the summit of the neighboring spire a gilded dragon taken from the church of Santa Sophia at Constantinople; and they looked grimly down upon the lurid fires which in this square consumed so many victims of the Duke of Alva, the cruel minister of Philip II.

Leaving this church, we walked a little distance to some mediæval cloisters of rare beauty. Through their deserted walls the winds of centuries have blown, but they retain sufficient traces of their noble architecture to show us what they must have been. Alas! like many other historic structures in the Netherlands, these cloisters were defaced and sacked by Puritan fanatics; for in those dreadful days — when the Inquisition was making this fair land a place of fiendish torture and unutterable misery, goaded by years of persecution and looking upon all such architecture as emblematic of the power which persecuted them — a multitude of image breakers, armed with ropes and hammers, swept like a whirlwind through the realm. The damage done by these iconoclasts was irreparable. In the cathedrals, statues were hurled from their pedestals, and paintings were torn from the walls; glorious stained-glass windows were shattered to atoms; ladders and ropes were used to reach the works of art, and lofty pinnacles and turrets, apparently inaccessible, were scaled by men who risked their lives to mar their beautiful decorations. Revolting scenes of sacrilege took place. Statues of Christ were thrown down with the rest; those of the Virgin suffered every insult; the sacred altars were defiled; the consecrated wine was drunk; the sacramental bread was thrown to dogs, and even the oil with which kings and priests had been anointed was used by these fanatics to grease their shoes. In one night thirty churches were sacked in Antwerp alone, and four hundred were despoiled in a single province within a few days. Thus, through a religious frenzy, easily understood, yet evermore to be regretted, the precious products of centuries of inspiration and persistent labor were completely ruined, and once more, as so many times before, the world was rendered poorer by the folly and bigotry of man.

A striking incident is told of a wealthy, though untitled, citizen of Ghent. One day, the mighty Emperor Charles V., needing two million florins, borrowed them all of this worthy man; and the same day, in token of his gratitude, promised that he would dine with him. The flattered merchant gave the Emperor a most magnificent repast; and, while they sipped their wine at the desert, tore up the monarch's promissory note and passed the pieces to him on a plate. "Sire," he said, "two million florins is a small sum to pay for the honor which your Majesty has done me to-day."

Musing upon the history of this Flemish city, once so famous for its wealth and power, I fancied I could see moving along its liquid thoroughfares, like phantoms of the past, the stately ships from India and Persia, bringing to Ghent the treasures of the Orient. Once more I watched march proudly through the city's streets its famous manufacturing guilds, a single one of which numbered forty thousand men. I saw its artisans pass by in such vast crowds that, when the bells were rung at morning, noon, and night, all other citizens were warned not to obstruct the living current sweeping on its way. Vessels, meantime, were not allowed to pass the draw-bridges, which were kept closed for the accommodation of the moving throng, and children were retained indoors, lest the industrial hosts should trample them to death. Larger than Paris even was this city in those days, and Charles V. had some justification for his famous pun on the French name of Ghent, when he said to the King of France, "I can put your Paris inside of my glove" (Je mettrai votre Paris dans mon Gant).

Saying farewell to Ghent, an hour's journey brought us to her former rival,—Bruges. There is no rivalry between the cities now. Ghent, though retaining but a shadow of her ancient glory, is still comparatively prosperous; but poor old Bruges shows little evidence of life and enterprise. Some stately buildings of the past remain, which give to her an air of wealth and dignity, and the old streets and market-places are, in form, the same; but few boats furrow now her deep canals, which, with the green scum floating on their stagnant surfaces, resemble unused country roads, half overgrown with grass. Even the numerous bridges of the town, which gave to her the Flemish title, Bruges, look lifeless and deserted, and most of the occupants of the handsome houses of the olden time are wealthy merchants who have retired from business, to spend the last years of their lives in absolute tranquillity. There seems to be no danger of its being disturbed.

I could not see that any business, save a little petty traffic, was transacted here, and it is said that nearly one-third of the inhabitants of Bruges are paupers. Beggars and guides annoyed us so persistently that, in self-defence as well as pity, we finally hired a "commissionaire," and gave all our spare pennies to the mendicants. I think we also saved a wretched cabman from committing suicide, by hiring his dilapidated vehicle at the astonishing price of twenty-five cents an hour! Cabs are, in fact, so cheap and slow in Bruges that I should have taken one from morning till night, if I had only had plenty of time.

Shaken about in one of these decrepit vehicles, driven over atrocious cobble-stone pavements, yet cheered by our approving consciences for thus encouraged industry, we entered the old market-upon the famous belfry is a majestic structure, fifty feet in height, fine stone-carving, and octagon, whose open-stands a noble view. edifice from which it government office, but part generated into a meat change, indeed, and them. precious cargoes ; that once, as a result of civil war, two hundred wagons were kept busy for a fortnight transporting loads of gold, silver, and valuable goods to the victorious city, Ghent ; that twenty foreign ministers lived then within her gates ; that here a German King was held prisoner twelve days, despite the threats of royal armies ; and that the Queen of France, on seeing the splendid dresses of the ladies of Bruges, exclaimed, "I thought that I alone was Queen, but here are hundreds whose costumes rival mine." dared to say to the ambassador of France, "Go tell your King that he is perjured, that we have elected a new sovereign, and that it is our privilege, not his, to choose our masters."

It is difficult to realize the prosperity which the Netherlands enjoyed three hundred years ago; but they supplied Charles V. with nearly one-half of his royal income: four times as much as was furnished by Spain, or by those Eldorados of the New World, — Mexico and Peru. The Low Countries then contained more than two hundred walled cities, all of which were in a flourishing condition. In all these towns belfries were constructed, fully as much for secular as for sacred purposes. In times of peace, it is true, they musically chimed the passing hours, and called the worshiper to prayer; but they were also deep-voiced sentinels, whose brazen clangor summoned citizens to arms, and brought them at a moment's notice, rushing from the remotest lanes, into the central square.

The name, Antwerp, is said to be derived from Flemish words which signify, "On the Wharf." If so, the title is appropriate, for it is on the wharves of Antwerp that the prosperity of the city is best understood. It is a town of great activity, and its superb quays — built by Napoleon I., when Antwerp formed a prominent part of his colossal empire — are crowded now with ships and steamers, and serve as a reminder of Bonaparte's gigantic plans and indefatigable industry. Yet, busy as Antwerp is to-day, it gives us but a hint of what its commerce was in the sixteenth century. Then twenty-five hundred ships could find shelter in its harbor, and it was no uncommon occurrence for five hundred arrivals and departures to be registered in a single day. Two thousand loaded wagons, also, from the neighboring provinces passed daily through the city's gates; and in addition to Antwerp's own commercial houses, more than a thousand foreign firms contended here in friendly rivalry. No city in all Christendom could equal Antwerp then in wealth and splendor. Her merchants lived in almost regal luxury; within her massive warehouses were precious goods from every land; and her superb cathedral, palaces, and public buildings, enriched with noble works of art, made her the marvel of the world.

But, alas! when did so great a treasure ever long escape the clutch of the despoiler? The Spaniards coveted this goodly city, and laid upon it the same cruel hand that proved a curse to all their colonies in the New World. In the capture of Antwerp by the Spanish army almost as many living beings were destroyed as there had been statues ruined in the memorable image breaking of ten years before. The annals of the Netherlands are illustrated by some of the most horrible pictures known to history; and one of the most revolting is that of the sack of Antwerp by the Spaniards. In three days, fully eight thousand men, women, and children were massacred, burned, or drowned, and bodies lay by hundreds in the streets. The Spanish soldiers, drunk with wine and blood, had cast off even the semblance of humanity, and played the part of fiends. The splendid city was well-nigh destroyed. Six million dollars' worth of property was burned, and five hundred marble residences were reduced to blackened ruins. The object of these terrible atrocities was gold, and to obtain it almost inconceivable cruelties were committed. To cite one out of many instances: a wedding feast was being celebrated when the Spaniards gained possession of the city. A mob of brutal soldiers rushed within the house, demanding gold and jewels. Not satisfied with what they found, they struck the bridegroom dead. The bride fell, shrieking, into her mother's arms, whence she was torn by the relentless ruffians, who immediately put the mother to death. The bride, who was of remarkable beauty, was then carried off. Maddened by this last outrage, her father tried to save her, and was killed. That night a woman, scantily clothed and trembling with fear, was found wandering through the streets among the heaps of dead and dying, looking for her husband and father. She was completely crazed; and the fair bride of a few hours before was finally put out of her misery by a mob of soldiers!

VAN DYCK.

Before the bar of History no nation has committed such atrocious crimes, or brought such evil upon millions of the world's inhabitants as Spain. Her terrible expulsion of the gifted Moors and wealthy Jews was one of the most deadly blows ever given to learning, art, and commerce, aside from its appalling cruelty and bigotry; the record of her conquests and tyrannical government in the New World has left on every foot of soil that she occupied a sickening trail of blood; and, while she ruled the Netherlands, she made the lives of its inhabitants a hell on earth, by pillaging cities, slaughtering, torturing, and burning thousands of innocent men, women, and children, and lighting every market-place with the fires of the Inquisition. In the whole history of mankind there is no sadder and more awful picture than that of the decline and wretchedness of this superbly prosperous and artistic country under the rule of Spain. Thousands abandoned the Netherlands and fled to England, and thousands who remained were put to death by fire and sword. In 1568 Antwerp had a population of one hundred and twenty-five thousand. Twenty years later its inhabitants numbered only fifty-five thousand. Since then, till recently, a series of misfortunes, including wars, political vicissitudes, revolutions, and unfortunate maritime decrees, has kept it from recovering its former prosperity. At present, however, it is rapidly regaining its lost fortunes, and if it has half a century more of peace, under as good a government as that of Leopold II., it will take long strides toward regaining the position it once occupied,—that of the leading maritime city.

Antwerp's cathedral spire has held the admiration of the world for centuries, and well deserves the eulogy of Napoleon, who compared it to a piece of Mechlin lace. On account of the flatness of the surrounding country, it is visible at a great distance, long before the rest of the town is seen, and the impression which it makes on the approaching tourist, who, as he sails along the winding Schelde, watches this solitary shaft of stone embroidery cutting its slender silhouette upon the sky, will not be easily forgotten. Its airy pinnacles contain about one hundred bells—the smallest sixteen inches in circumference, the largest weighing eight tons—and from these there floats out upon the air a combination of melodious sounds scarcely surpassed, I think, in Europe. It is hard to realize that this graceful tower was standing, in peaceful beauty, through all the dreadful scenes of carnage which have stained the history of Antwerp, and that its chimes rang out as sweetly then as now, above the shouts of triumph and the moans of anguish in the streets below. Aside from its bell-tower, however, the cathedral dral of Antwerp is disappointing. Not only has the space surrounding it been invaded by a number of mean buildings, but the effect of the interior is sadly marred by the presence of whitewashed walls and columns. Still, as the spire redeems the exterior, so the interior of the church is atoned for, and even endeared to lovers of art, by the two masterpieces of Rubens which hang on either side of the high altar: the "Elevation of the Cross," and the "Descent from the Cross."

We climbed to the lofty belfry of the cathedral, and looked down on the city and the adjoining plain; and, as we watched the river Schelde winding through cultivated fields, like a long thread of silver woven in a figured carpet, we were reminded of a striking proof of bravery connected with this peaceful stream. In 1831, during the war between the Dutch and Belgians, a Holland gunboat was driven ashore here in a heavy gale. The Belgian men-of-war at once surrounded it, and summoned its commander to surrender. Seeing that further opposition was impossible, and yet determined never to give up what had been entrusted to his care, the captain rushed to the powder magazine, threw into it a lighted match, and, in a moment more, a terrible explosion wrecked the ship and killed a hundred of the advancing enemy. Thus did this officer, who in childhood had been adopted by the state, and had received his education at government expense, nobly repay the debt he owed his country; and, in her turn, Holland showed her gratitude by rearing a monument to his memory, and ordering that one vessel in her navy should always bear his honored name.

HOLLAND

I SHALL never forget my first experience in Holland. How eagerly and laughingly we gazed about us at our new surroundings. Was it, then, possible that land could be as flat as this? At times, I fancied it a smooth green carpet, dotted here and there with windmills which looked like pegs designed to keep tapestry in place; at other times, the country seemed like a gigantic raft, which nothing but the constant efforts of its mariners could keep afloat. In view of this uninterrupted area of level territory, who would be much surprised if the Dutch government should stamp upon its coins the motto recently chosen by a youthful bride to ornament her suite of rooms, "God bless our flat"? Rising from such a level foundation, buildings in Holland appear tall and windmills monstrous. Even the cows look larger than those of other lands, and, quite in harmony with their surroundings, have flat horns. They are sleek, handsome creatures, such as the

Flemish painters have portrayed so often, and stand in groups upon the velvet turf, whose verdant surface has a glow as soft as that of porcelain. These herds of happy cattle were as sedate as their owners, and made no effort to run away when we approached, but merely gazed in large-eyed wonder at our passing train.

Holland is not usually considered a beautiful country, but it possesses one peculiar charm of scenery that I have never seen surpassed. The flatness and extent of its broad, green meadows by the sea permit unusually long perspectives, under the lowering clouds, to the very verge of the horizon, much as the traveler finds them on the ocean. At such a time, the sight of cattle, trees, and windmills etched boldly on the band of light which intervenes between the clouds and the horizon line is wonderfully effective; and I have rarely seen in any landscape more fascinating pictures than Holland can reveal upon a showery afternoon, when, as the clouds drift by, the windmills, cows, and meadows dissolve into a silvery mist, and, a few minutes later, reappear through a pale, shimmering veil of gray and gold. No land has ever been more faithfully portrayed in art than Holland, and many times a day the traveler in the Netherlands sees duplicates of scenes which the old Dutch painters have immortalized.

The two most characteristic features of Holland are its windmills and canals.

TIRELESS LABORERS.

The former seem innumerable. In fact, the country often appears to be alive with these revolving monsters, which, when in motion, look like giants turning handsprings on the horizon; and, when at rest, resemble lighthouses above the sea. But "rest" for these industrious slaves is a rare occurrence. Employed for almost every kind of labor, they grind corn, saw wood, pulverize rock, manufacture paper, and cut tobacco into snuff; while their most important duty is to pump out of the marshes into the canals the water which would otherwise submerge the land. Think of an army of ten thousand of these tireless automata working continually, day and night, to raise the liquid of the lowlands high enough to let it find an exit to the sea!

The largest wind-

mills, it is said, will, in a fair breeze, lift ten thousand gallons of water per minute to the height of four feet.

Who can refuse unstinted admiration to the persevering Hollanders, who have thus yoked the inconstant wind and forced it not only to work for them, but also to contend with their great enemy, water? It is true, the windmills often look rebellious, and fling their long arms madly round and round, as if in frantic protest at their slavery; but, nevertheless, they faithfully perform their allotted tasks, and are a practical illustration of the rough but wholesome words of Emerson: "Borrow the might of the elements. Hitch your wagon to a star, and see the chores done by the gods themselves." A Hollander's wealth is often estimated, not by bonds and mortgages, but by windmills. "How rich is such a man?" I once asked. "Ten or twelve windmills," was the answer.

A BIT OF HOLLAND.

The climax of Dutch ingenuity has been reached, however, in compelling the ocean—their natural enemy, which threatens constantly to overwhelm them—to actually aid them in repelling human foes; for, by an intricate system of locks and sluices, they can inundate certain sections of the country, and either drown or drive away invaders. Small, therefore, though their army be, the Hollanders have a natural ally that even the best-trained European soldiers cannot conquer; and the brave Dutch may well exclaim to any mightier nation which shall try to rob them of their independence, "One, with God, is a majority."

So profoundly uneventful seems Dutch existence, that I should think physicians would prescribe a residence in sleepy lightful hours, having practically no limit to their wanderings; since they are able, if they choose, to glide for miles along these frozen highways, and visit in a short time, and with no cost of transportation, numerous towns and villages. Thus people often skate from Rotterdam to the Hague, and return the same day; in all, a distance of thirty miles. It is a common thing for boys and girls to skate to school, and even for Dutch ladies to make use of skates to do their marketing. Cities, too, institute ice carnivals, and invite their neighbors to join them in skating festivals.

The lower classes in Holland have an advantage in dress over their superiors, when skating; for their baggy trousers serve as sails, and when a plethoric Dutchman puts his hands in his pockets and expands his nether garments, so as to catch the breeze, he rapidly leaves behind him those who are clad in the conventional style. It should, however, be remembered that these canals, when frozen, are not merely avenues of pleasure, but are also used as thoroughfares of transportation. Hence skaters on them frequently encounter sledges, containing articles which would in summer be conveyed by boats.

Delighted with the oddity and beauty of Holland scenery, we saw at last from our car window the city of Rotterdam. This famous centre of Dutch commerce, fourteen miles from the North Sea, lies at the union of two rivers, one of which is called Rotter, and with the great dike, erected on its banks, gives to the town the name of Rotter-dam. This is a clew by which to comprehend all similar titles. Thus, Amster-dam signifies the dam upon the Amstel; and the names Schiedam, Zaändam, Edam, Durgedam, Volendam, and all the other "dams" refer to dikes in their vicinity.

THE RAILROAD BRIDGE, ROTTERDAM.

DRAWBRIDGES, ROTTERDAM.

On my first walk in Rotterdam, I was bewildered by its multitude of bridges. From almost any halting-place I could count eight or ten; and, as most of them were drawbridges, they rose and fell like parts of an immense machine. Another feature of the town that seemed to me remarkable was the sign which I observed quite frequently above the doors of shops, "Fire and Water to sell." If it had read simply "Fire-water," I might have concluded that Holland gin could there be bought; but "Fire and Water" puzzled me, until I learned that a regular trade is carried on here of selling to the poor hot peat and boiling water, with which to cook their frugal meals. Many boats are employed in bringing water to the city for sale.

A CANAL IN ROTTERDAM.

ROTTERDAM.

For, strange as it may seem, with a situation where land and ocean struggle for supremacy, Rotterdam, as well as almost all the other Dutch cities, is in the condition of Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, with "Water, water everywhere, nor any drop to drink." I refer, however, to good drops. There are, of course, stale, insipid, and malodorous drops; but pure, sweet, wholesome water, the best gift of God, is not easily found in the Low Countries. I was not much surprised, therefore, to see two men propelling through the various canals a barge containing casks of drinking water, which they announced by cries resembling those of our itinerant venders of oranges and strawberries. People who have no cisterns buy it by the gallon; the price, of course, varying in times of drought, or in midwinter when the canals are frozen. It is not strange, then, that not far from Rotterdam is a thriving town, in which three hundred distilleries produce the finest gin the world affords. Personally speaking, of all liquors, gin is the least attractive to my taste; but, as a choice of evils, if I had for any length of time to imbibe the natural water of Rotterdam, I certainly should be tempted to disguise its taste with what the Dutch call schnapps.

Among other Dutch peculiarities, I noticed that almost every man in Rotterdam had a cigar or pipe in his mouth.

The Hollanders are inveterate smokers. The boatmen, it is said, measure distances by smoke and reckon, not so many miles from place to place, but so many pipes. Some Dutchmen, it is alleged, go to sleep at night with their pipes between their lips, so that they may find them there the first thing in the morning, and light them before rising to the duties and trials of another day. Tobacco smoke is, therefore, called their second breath, and a cigar the sixth finger of their hands.

This habit, combined with the peculiar climate, makes them the calmest, most phlegmatic people upon earth. Smoking in America's dry atmosphere excites and irritates; but among the Dutch canals it drugs and stupefies.

In one of the streets of Rotterdam, I was shown the home of the greatest smoker that the world has known. Meinheer Van Klaes, as he was called, consumed, on the average, one hundred and fifty grams of tobacco every day, yet lived till he was ninety-eight years old. His last will and testament was extraordinary. After bequeathing most of his possessions to his relatives, he thus directed how he should be buried: "I wish that all my friends who are smokers shall be specially invited to my funeral. Each of them shall receive a package of tobacco and two pipes, and they are requested to smoke uninterruptedly during the funeral ceremonies. My body shall be enclosed in a coffin lined with the wood of my old cigar boxes. Beside me in the casket shall be laid my favorite meerschaum, a box of matches, and a package of tobacco. When my body is lowered into the grave, every person present is requested to pass by and cast upon it the ashes from his pipe." These touching requests, it is said, were faithfully complied with. His friends attended in prodigious numbers; and, at the funeral, the smoke was so dense that a horn had to be blown to enable the mourners to find the door.

From this city of the champion smoker, we journeyed to the still more interesting Dutch metropolis, Amsterdam. This has been often called the "Venice of the North"; but the title is somewhat of a misnomer. It is true, there is a certain general resemblance between the cities, from the fact that Amsterdam is founded upon ninety islands, furrowed by miles of liquid streets, spanned by about three hundred bridges; moreover, the sea is in her thoroughfares and laves the doorsteps of her shops and houses; but there all likeness between Amsterdam and its Italian rival ends. While the Dutch city calls forth admiration and respect, the Adriatic Queen inspires a romantic sentiment akin to love. Venice is golden; Amsterdam is gray. The City of the Doges is poetical; that of the Dutch Burghers is prosaic. The southern city is voluptuous and tender, mysterious with her memories of splendor and decay. The city of the North is cold and practical, with a complacent air of solid worth and unimpeachable respectability.

The contrast between the cities is, perhaps, best shown by the conveyances peculiar to each place. In Venice they are those dusky spirits of the canals,—the slender, graceful gon-dolas. In Amsterdam they are the heavy boats of traffic. The future of the cities, also, will be entirely different. Venice is dying like a gorgeous sunset; but Amsterdam, the rugged offspring of the northern sea, is, for its size, one of the wealthiest cities in the world; its bankers hold the securities of every nation, and on its broad canals float vessels from all quarters of the globe.

A SIDE STREET IN AMSTERDAM.

Many of the barges in Amsterdam form the abodes of people who have no other homes. Among a certain class of Hollanders, when a young man has saved or borrowed money enough he buys a huge, broad-shouldered boat; and, like the Patriarch Noah, leads into it not only his family, but also all the animals of which he is possessed, including poultry, hogs, and even cows. Thenceforth he is independent; and, as the master of a floating house, stable, farmyard, and express cart all in one, and never absent from his family, he transports loads of merchandise from town to town, and even sells a few superfluous eggs, or a little milk. What is most amusing is the way in which such an amphibious farmer, having moored his boat, takes his wares from house to house;

for he may be frequently observed standing without a blush of shâme beside the only vehicle I ever saw, that could be properly called a dog-cart! How often on my walks in Holland I have met peasants tramping along in whitewashed wooden shoes, beside a muzzled dog which sometimes staggered, and frequently lay down from sheer exhaustion! It makes no difference what their size or breed may be, all dogs are forced to labor here unmercifully. My pity for them may be owing to the fact that in America dogs are regarded merely as pets; but I confess that I always felt, on observing Holland dogs compelled to draw heavy loads, much as I do at seeing children kept from play and made to labor in factories. Moreover, the work of Dutch dogs does not end, when the merchandise is sold; for, when the chance is offered him, the driver seats himself in the cart, which frequently is heavy enough for a small pony, and makes his wretched steeds draw him home. It really exasperated me to see this treatment of the canine race in Holland. But the dogs are cheap, and the men are either lazy or hard-hearted; hence, so long as no society exists there to prevent it, man's most devoted friend and trusty comrade will probably be compelled to lead a worse existence than is indicated by our expression, "A dog's life!"

Sometimes, however, Hans does not own a dog. What then? Does he assume the load himself? O, no! He puts it on his wife. "Gretchen," he says, "bring me my pipe, like a good hausfrau, and I will help you get the yoke upon your shoulders." Then, while he calmly sits upon the deck, a halo of tobacco smoke about his head, his patient spouse goes on her way, like the mere beast of burden that she is. I wonder if she ever asks the question, "Is marriage a failure?" Poor creature! We may laugh at her odd dress, her hat which looks like a wash basin inverted, and the huge bows of stiff, black cloth which stand out from her head like a bat's wings; but, after all, hers is a sad fate, and will continue to be till the Holland peasant rises to some sense of chivalry. It must be confessed, also, that Dutch husbands, in even the middle and upper classes of society, do not show excessive gallantry to their wives.

I shall not soon forget a conversation I once had with my landlady in Amsterdam. Amazed, apparently, at my expressions of sympathy for Holland dogs and peasant women, she said to me: "I am going to tell you something which I know will please you, and which is really true. Some years ago, an American gentleman and his wife were boarding with me. The lady was recovering from an illness, and one day her husband wished her to take a drive. Now, what do you think he did? Why, when the horses were at the door, he took his wife up in his arms, carried her downstairs, and put her into the carriage. Nor was that all. When they returned, he took her in his arms again and carried her upstairs. There! Did you ever hear of such a thing as that? Was not the man a saint?"

A HOLLAND HEADRESS.

"A saint!" I answered, "not at all, he was only an American."

The little houses in the vicinity of Amsterdam are thoroughly characteristic of Holland. Their sharply pointed roofs of bright red tiles, their neatly painted walls and blinds, a monstrous windmill on one side, and panting dogs on the other, — these are features of Dutch scenery which multiply themselves here almost endlessly. Stopping occasionally at one of these houses to inquire my way, I found the floors and tables scoured and polished, as if they had been sandpapered; the pots and pans glistened as if made of gold and silver; and in one room I noticed that all the chairs were tipped forward, with their hind feet on the top edge of the baseboard, so that the dust should not settle upon the seats in the short interval that could elapse between one dusting and another.

Even in the better streets of Amsterdam, among the residences of its wealthy citizens, there is not much display of luxury. The houses are quite plain, though built of brick, and have stone trimmings at the doors and windows; a flight of steps leads sideways up to the front door, so as to take as little space as possible on the sidewalk; and the windows, of huge plate glass, are exquisitely polished. Outside of them are frequently mirrors, placed at such an angle as to reflect the scene below; for Hollanders lead such quiet lives that they are naturally curious to know all that goes on about them. The older houses with their pointed gables have, usually, above the attic window a beam and pulley hanging over the street. I jestingly called these at first a kind of gallows, on which the

Dutch of former times were wont to hang such thoughtless miscreants as dared intrude upon their polished floors with muddy feet. They were, in fact, invented as an aid to cleanliness; for by these pulleys are still hoisted into the attics all articles of household use which might deface the immaculate front steps and halls.

I could not walk along these streets without inquiring what was done to prevent accidents by drowning. How can Dutch children, for example, ever play upon such narrow sidewalks without falling into the canals, and how can the men who have imbibed too freely of schnapps contrive to guide their reeling steps along these narrow spaces, which are unguarded by a parapet, and have the friendly lamp-posts few and far between? Yet I was told that deaths from drowning here are rare, partly because the Dutch are naturally cautious; chiefly, no doubt, because long practice renders them as certain of their steps as Blondin on his swinging rope.

To a Dutchman it would seem impossible to have too much water about his house. Even with a canal in front and another on each side, he will add, if possible, an artificial pond in his small garden as a necessary adjunct to his comfort, and, if he builds a summer-house, he will, by preference, locate it over a canal.

From Amsterdam we journeyed to the beautiful Dutch capital,—the Hague.

It is a charming place; not quite so odd as Amsterdam and Rotterdam, since the majority of its streets are not canals; but it has all the best peculiarities of Holland, without an undue prominence of water and unsavory odors. Indeed, I think there is not in the whole of Europe, from Lisbon to St. Petersburg, a cleaner and more aristocratic city than the Hague. Its site was formerly a densely wooded hunting park belonging to the Counts of Holland, which gave the town that subsequently rose here its quaint Dutch title: "s Graven Hage," or the Count's Garden.

As a rule, the architecture of the Hague is not only solid and substantial, but handsome; not with the showy finery of Paris or Vienna, but rather like a dress, whose tasteful colors and perfect adaptation to the form lead one to thoroughly admire it, without at first being able to explain its charm. An air of elegance and leisure pervades its streets. We feel that here is the repose of wealth served by attentive tradesmen. At Rotterdam, they say, one makes his fortune; at Amsterdam he increases it; but at the Hague he spends it.

One of the most impressive features of the Dutch capital is the National Monument, the sight of which recalls the founder of the nation's independence, — William, the Silent. This hero is as highly revered in Holland as Washington is in the United States. As the principal opponent of Philip II. in the Netherlands, he was the incarnation of the national spirit in the noblest epoch of Dutch history, and dared to stand forth as the fearless leader of a persecuted people, in opposition to the mightiest monarch then on earth, whose kingdom included Spain, Belgium, Holland, a part of Italy, and a portion of North Africa, and threw its baneful shadow over the West Indies, Mexico, and Peru. Yet Philip II. with all these resources could not crush him; and finally, in 1580, was base enough to offer a reward of twenty-five thousand crowns and a title of nobility to any one who would assassinate him. Responsive to this shameful bribe, a score of dastardly assassins watched for a chance to strike the fatal blow. Eight desperate attempts were made before the one that finally succeeded. On Sunday, the 10th of July, 1584, the Prince, in company with some friends, was going down the stairway of his house to dinner. Leaning upon his arm was his beautiful young wife, who had already, several years before, witnessed in Paris the murder of her father in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Suddenly a man stepped from a corner of the corridor and extended a petition. The Prince requested him to come again when he was not engaged, and passed on to the dining-hall. The stranger walked away without a word. During the usual gay and cheerful past, William was as Silent," does not imply that he was taciturn or gloomy, but merely that he could, and did, conceal his plans with marvelous dexterity. His wife, however, appeared troubled, and spoke to him several times of the strange man whom they had just met in the hall, saying that he had certainly the most villainous face that she had ever seen. William laughed lightly at her fears and reassured her; then, at the close of the repast, he led his wife and friends once more along the corridor. As he approached the staircase, the assassin, who was waiting, sprang forth and shot him in the breast. The Prince reeled backward a few steps, and fell into the arms of his young wife. Five minutes later, one of the noblest of human hearts had ceased to beat.

Some of my pleasantest memories of the Hague are connected with the spacious park that lies between that city and the sea. Whoever is fond of level walks and drives, beneath magnificent oaks and elms, will find this park enchanting.

THE PARK.

Moreover, as it is three miles long, it is never overcrowded, and so luxuriant is its vegetation that I believe the statement made by a Dutch writer, that in the Hague and its vicinity there can be found a tree, a flower, and a bird for each of its inhabitants.

Here and there, within its cool enclosure, are villas of great beauty, in one of which the Queen resides in summer; yet there is no unusual seclusion in this abode of royalty. Strangers may wander freely through the grounds, and even enter the villa at certain hours of the day, for the park is looked upon as national property and is accessible to all. It is the remnant of an enormous forest, which formerly covered the entire territory of the Netherlands, and enabled its primitive inhabitants to resist for so long a time the legions of imperial Rome. On many of the historic elms and beeches in this forest the names of famous individuals have been bestowed. Hence they are dear to every Hollander. More than once, in their heroic struggle for independence, the Dutch were tempted to dispose of these trees for money, which was so essential; but when it came to the decisive act, the citizens always saved them by a voluntary contribution.

The history of Holland is a record of the unexpected.

One would suppose that this flat country—formed principally of the mud deposited by the Rhine, the Meuse, and the Schelde—would be the last part of the world to be the scene of bloody wars and fiendish cruelties; yet on this marshy soil, threaded by sluggish streams and brooded over by the exhalations of a threatening sea, bloodshed and torture

cast their baneful shadows for a hundred years. Here, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, were enacted some of the most important deeds in the world's history; and on a land, whose very existence is a perpetual conflict between life and death, occurred a struggle for religious and political freedom, unsurpassed in suffering and heroism. The Dutch are sometimes ridiculed as being stupid. It is a serious mistake. Although they live of necessity a great part of the time in cloudland, they are the most practical people on the face of the earth. Slow they undoubtedly are; but they exemplify the fable of the tortoise and the hare, and retain abundant proofs of their career of conquest and commercial enterprise when they were rivals of Great Britain, and wrested from the Portuguese the sovereignty of the eastern seas. Small as their mother country is, the Dutch possess, to-day, in the Indian Ocean a splendid archipelago, which a Holland writer has compared to a girde of emeralds strung along the equator; and in Java, Sumatra, Borneo, New Guinea, and other islands they have a colonial empire that covers an area of eight hundred thousand square miles, and includes a population of thirty-three million souls.

After driving for two miles through the charming forest near the Hague, we reached the little town of Scheveningen. Historically, this is interesting as the port from which Charles II. sailed for England when he was recalled from exile after the death of Cromwell; but it is chiefly famous now as the fashionable watering-place of the Hague. Between the capital and this resort horse-cars and cabs are always rolling back and forth; and on bright summer days the entire population of the Hague appears to have assembled on the ocean sands. The fashionable life of Scheveningen is similar to that of every Continental bathing-place. There are, of course, the grand hotels, the crowds upon the beach, the bathing-carts, the wicker chairs for invalids, the music, dancing, and flirtation that characterize Brighton, Margate, Biarritz, and Ostend; but there is also quite another life at Scheveningen, peculiar to the country, and indicated most appropriately by the curious figures which now and then stand forth in striking contrast to the ephemeral gaiety on the shore. The pleasure seekers lead a butterfly existence here for two or three months, and then depart; but the old fishermen remain permanent features of the landscape. I found the natives of the Holland coast interesting objects of study. Living within two miles of the capital, and every summer visited by the crowds of fashion, they nevertheless preserve unchanged the primitive habits of their forefathers. Such as they were three centuries ago they are to-day. The personal appearance of some of them is extraordinary. Their skin resembles the exterior of a smoke-cured ham, and is as thickly seamed with wrinkles as Holland is with canals. I fancied that the rain must run in regular channels down their cheeks. Their mouths are usually large, and, when no teeth are visible, as is not infrequently the case, they open like old-fashioned carpetbags. I recollect that one of these "toilers of the sea" had legs, the curving lines of which I never saw surpassed, save in a wishbone or a lobster's claws; and I could never understand what must have happened to him in infancy to give his limbs a shape that would have made his fortune in a dime museum.

INTERIOR OF A DUTCH COTTAGE.

The Sunday costume of the Scheveningen men consists of high-buttoned jackets, baggy trousers, and long stockings. That of the women is still more peculiar. They wear a kind of nightcap, with embroidered edges, drawn tightly over the head and ears. Beneath this hangs, on each side of the face, something which looks in the distance like a misplaced switch, but proves to be a solitary curl. The uninitiated visitor might suppose that the special glory of their dress was a kind of vest, embroidered with all the colors of the rainbow; but their real wealth is estimated, not by the richness of their jackets, but by the number of skirts worn at one time. Sometimes a woman boasts of wearing twelve or fifteen, at once, fastened around her ample waist.

INTERIOR OF A FISHERMAN'S HOUSE.

Both men and women encase their feet in wooden shoes, which seem appropriate when half immersed in sand; but on city pavements they make a noise resembling the rattle of "bones" between the fingers of a negro minstrel.

The faces of these fisher folk look old and anxious; but who can be surprised at this? What a toilsome, cheerless life they lead the greater part of the year, when only the women and children can remain to watch and wait and keep the hearthstone bright, while all the stalwart men of the village are at sea! But when the fleet comes back there is joy indeed. Women and children then rush down upon the sands to welcome their returning fathers, husbands, and brothers. An old man rides on horseback through the surf, catches the rope thrown from the prow of the first ship, and brings back to the crowd the news as to the draught of herring, and (more important still) whether all the men are safe and well. Then follow the excitement of the landing, the eager welcome home, and, last of all, the public sale of fish upon the shore. During these scenes the sad-eyed, anxious women seem transfigured. I saw some faces which looked almost beautiful, when turned with love and pride toward the brave men who, doubtless, seemed to them like warriors coming home from battle. Nor is this strange, for as I walked along this beach, and watched the square-built, clumsy ships, I wondered that their crews ever came back from the fierce conflict with the elements. What an experience it must be to live for months, tossed up and down in rolling tubs like these, upon the billows of the terrible North Sea, which either sulks for weeks at a time beneath its sombre sky and cloak of fog, or grows tempestuous if ruffled by the lightest gale, and is forever peopled in the popular mind with monsters longing to engulf all who dare to spread a sail above its waves.

As evening deepened into night, I walked alone upon the beach at Scheveningen. A storm had swept the sea for hours, and now its cumulative waves, baffled in search of leaped toward the beach, like some chained monster, foaming at the mouth, whose leash might break at any moment. As I surveyed it, with that mingled dread and fascination which such scenes inspire, and recollected that large portions of the land behind me lay many feet below the ocean level, the wealth and comfort I had seen in Holland's prosperous cities and other prey, sought to expend their fury on the helpless shore; but held back by the curb which Nature's tidal forces had silently imposed upon them, the angry billows spat their hatred impotently on the land in hissing spray, which rose to an appalling height and then productive farms appeared almost miraculous, since they had been acquired and were preserved only by splendid courage and untiring toil, in battling against that element which reigns supreme over three-quarters of the globe. HOLLAND BELOW THE OCEAN LEVEL.

tanic struggle; and although more than fifteen hundred million dollars have been expended in constructing ramparts, two millions are used annually to maintain them. Surely, no Hollander should find it difficult to believe the story of the Deluge, or fail to comprehend that part of the Mosaic account of the Creation which tells of the dividing of "the waters from the waters." Two hundred years ago Holland was described as "A country that draws fifty feet of water,

 In which men live as in the hold of nature;
 And when the sea does in upon them break,
 And drowns a province, does but spring a leak."

To me, however, it resembles rather a beleaguered fortress, before whose gates a tireless foe is constantly at work, now undermining secretly its massive dikes, now charging furiously on the rescued soil, as if determined to reclaim its own. The danger can be best appreciated by standing behind one of Holland's ocean bulwarks at high tide, and hearing the breakers dash against the other side of the wall, sixteen or eighteen feet above the level of the land. For, although calm and beautiful at times, the North Sea can be treacherous and cruel. Again and again it has forced an entrance here, and by a sudden onset of its waves has laid waste prosperous towns and peaceful villages and swept to destruction thousands of inhabitants.

In the fearful inundation, of 1570, nearly all the dikes were destroyed, ships were carried into the interior of the country, and one hundred thousand people are said to have perished. Yet the indomitable Dutch have always rallied, undismayed, to expel the foe, and have invariably succeeded. Recently, they have even assumed the offensive, and compelled the ocean to retire from land which it had occupied for centuries. Hundreds of square miles of territory have, in the last few years, been wrested from the sea solely by means of windmills; and the fields, thus rescued and walled in with massive dikes, are spotted now with herds of cattle ruminating peacefully where, but a little while ago, the sea rolled fathoms deep. Truly, a country that can thus repel an enemy of such tremendous power ; and has, moreover, called the winds of heaven to assist her in the conflict, is a magnificent proof of man's superiority over nature ; and, as I trod the battle-ground of these contending forces, I realized, as never before, the truth of the familiar proverb : " God made the sea, but the Dutch have made the shore."

MEXICO

THE oldest gateways of our great republic face the rising sun. Through these our ancestors entered the New World. Up to their portals for two hundred years has swept a ceaseless flood of immigration from an older shore. Through them, to-day, there ebbs and flows a mighty tide of tourists, who every spring go forth to wander in historic Europe, and every fall return through the same gateways to their homes. Within the last few years, however, a portion of this stream of travel has sought other channels, and through the doorways of our western coast, facing the mightiest ocean on our globe, increasing thousands annually make their way to Alaska or Japan.

OUR PRIVATE CAR.

AN ADOBE HOUSE.

But transit through the ports of the Atlantic or Pacific implies an ocean voyage, which is to many a serious drawback. There still remains, however, on our southern boundary, a door which has not this objection; for there, divided from us by no ocean barrier, but only by a narrow river called the Rio Grande, lies outstretched beneath the Southern Cross, and not unlike a mighty cornucopia in form, a land of which we know as yet far less than we have learned of Europe, and hardly more than we now know of China and Japan; a country of mysterious origin and vast antiquity; of noble scenery and impressive history; of picturesque costumes, and a life half Spanish and half Oriental; the dwelling-place of Aztecs and of Spaniards; the battleground of Montezuma and of Cortez; the realm of sunshine and of silver, — Mexico.

It was exactly midnight when we glided through the southern gateway known as "Eagle Pass," and our long line of cars crept out in Indian file upon the bridge that spans the Rio Grande. Below me I could see a silver streak, sharply defined between two parallel lines, which I well knew to be the opposite shores of the United States and Mexico. No matter how extensively one may have traveled, he feels instinctively a thrill of emotion on entering an unknown land. In going to Europe, this feeling comes upon one gradually. The ocean voyage is a preparation for an advent on a foreign shore. Entering Mexico, however, the change is almost instantaneous, and I shall long recall the sensation I experienced, when, poised above the Rio Grande, I saw at the same instant, in the gloom of night, on one side the dim outline of my native land, and on the other the sombre profile of the Mexican republic.

The next morning I awoke to find myself in a foreign country. I saw that we were rolling through a perfectly flat plain, flanked on the east and west by mountain ranges. Apparently this area was once the bed of a gigantic lake, perhaps a portion of the Gulf of Mexico. To-day it is almost as sterile as a desert. Mile after mile, and hour after hour, we looked upon a desolate expanse of sand, arid and blistered by a burning sun. For nine months it had received no rain. Its only vegetation was a stunted growth of prickly pear and cactus plants, occasionally varied by "Spanish bayonet" trees, which look like porcupines on poles. While traveling through this dreary waste we saw, for hours at a time, no signs of life save an occasional buzzard circling in the air, in search of some poor creature stricken by the sun. In certain localities, however, goats are as numerous as on the heights above New York. Their diet is not confined to such dyspeptic articles as sardine boxes and tomato cans; but each to his taste! To Mexican goats the Spanish bayonet spikes are doubtless just as sweet as New York clothes-pins, and prickly cactus leaves replace for them the worn-out hair brushes of Harlem.

Looking upon such cheerless scenery, the traveler at first exclaims, "This is an uninviting route by which to enter Mexico"; and, it must be confessed, the first appearance of the country is exceedingly unattractive. To ride four hundred miles through alkali plains, the dust of which sifts through the windows of the car and lies in spoonfuls on his clothing, is a grim penalty that every tourist who goes to Mexico must pay.

But, after all, he has to endure it only twenty-four hours; and what is that compared to the tribute which old Neptune frequently exacts from travelers crossing the Atlantic? The mountains which enclose this wilderness relieve the landscape from complete monotony. Their strange forms offer infinite variety. Without a single break, they line the desert all day long; at times advancing, then retreating, precisely like the rugged shores of an extensive lake. When close at hand, their sunburnt peaks look savage and forbidding; but, at a distance, a soft, mellow haze conceals their harsher features, and renders them as delicate in coloring as an aquarelle.

We could not understand, at first, why railway stations should have been built upon this Mexican desert. The depot was often the only building visible, surrounded by half a dozen scrawny palms, resembling worn-out feather dusters, and dominated by a telegraph pole, cutting its form like a gigantic gibbet against the sky; but, several miles distant from these stations, there is usually a large plantation, or a little town, between which and the railroad regular communication is maintained by means of tram-cars or a stage-coach. One of those stage-coaches I shall never forget. I looked at it as I might have gazed upon an instrument of torture used by the Inquisition. It seemed more perfectly adapted to inflict excruciating misery upon its occupants than any vehicle I had ever seen, even in the remotest districts of old Spain. Could it be possible that after five or six decades of active service in the Mother Country, this coach had been sent out to Mexico? Its springs had originally been of leather, but were now of rope. The doors had, apparently, passed through several desperate conflicts with banditti. The windows had been long since broken out. The white dust lay so thick upon the seats that I at first supposed them to be covered with gray cloth, until I felt my fingers sink into the powdery mass to reach at last a species of bed-rock, which at some unknown period of the past had been a leather cushion. Yet this was the regular coach between the station and a village forty miles away. Five reckless passengers were about to risk their lives in its interior. The fare was three dollars. I asked if this included the services of an undertaker on arriving at their destination, but could not get a satisfactory reply. After long years of traveling in such vehicles as this, it is not strange that the Mexicans regarded tram-cars, drawn by mules along smooth rails, a priceless luxury, and made no serious objection when the railroads only came within a few miles of their towns.

A MEXICAN PRIVATE CARRIAGE.

Indeed, tramways in Mexico sometimes connect the railroad with cities thirty or forty miles distant, the longest line—between Vera Cruz and Jalapa—covering a distance of seventy-six miles. Until comparatively recent times, with the exception of the highway built from the coast by Cortez, communication here was chiefly made on horseback. The difficulties of stage-coach traveling were sometimes almost insurmountable. A Mexican gentleman told me that, twenty years ago, a trip from Guadalajara to the capital required (when the roads were good) about six days. “And how long when the roads were bad?” I asked. “Six months,” was the reply.

Near one of the stations

we beheld a group of Mexican horsemen, each thoroughly armed, and wearing on his head a dark sombrero. These cavaliers were once highwaymen, who held up the stages, robbed the passengers, and rendered traveling here romantic. But President Diaz reformed them. On coming into power, he sent for their leaders and inquired: "My friends, how much does highway robbery pay you on an average every year?" They named a certain sum. "Well," continued the President, "would you not prefer to earn that money honestly and feel that you will die like Christians?" Most of them thought they would, and the interview closed with a promise of a salary of forty dollars a month; in return for which the men agreed to furnish arms and horses, and (as the "Mexican Rural Guards") to keep the country free from bandits. With such protectors who can feel unsafe in Mexico?

PRIMITIVE LOCOMOTION.

ON THE TABLE-LAND.

The next morning, we found that we had left the desert and its heat behind and below us. All through the night our engine had been toiling upward, till we had reached the Mexican table-land.

Three-fourths of Mexico is a plateau, from six thousand to eight thousand feet above the level of the sea. Were it not lifted thus to a plane far higher than the summit of Mount Washington, the climate of Mexico would be that of Nubia; but, once transported to that height, the traveler finds a temperature delightful throughout the entire year. Unaware of this fact, I had supposed a trip to Mexico, in any season except winter, would be uncomfortable; but, on the contrary, in some respects the pleasantest time to visit Aztec land is summer. May is usually the hottest season of the year, yet though I spent a portion of that month in the City of Mexico I wore a light overcoat every evening.

A MEXICAN VILLAGE.

The remaining fourth of Mexico, which is not table-land, is easily described. Whether the tourist journeys east or west from the centre of the country, he will soon find himself upon the edge of the plateau, almost as if he were standing on the brink of a precipice. From this the land descends abruptly, on one side toward the Gulf of Mexico, and on the other toward the Pacific and the Gulf of California. There are, however, certain intervening terraces, breaking the steep descent, which are called temperate regions, because the elevation of three thousand feet above the sea gives them a moderate and delightful climate. Below these are the Tierras Calientes, or Hot Lands, of the coast. What an amazing country then, is this, which has three zones: the tropical, the temperate, and the cold, ranged not from south to north, as elsewhere in the northern hemisphere, but upward, from the ocean level toward the sky! Moreover, on the grand plateau, some of the loftiest mountains of our planet tower still further heavenward, wearing eternally their coronets of snow. In twenty-four hours, therefore, if he will, the traveler in Mexico may pass through almost every grade of climate known upon the globe, from torrid heat to glacial cold.

During the day, and frequently half the night, when we were side-tracked in one place, men, women, and children gathered about our car like sea-gulls round an ocean steamer, eagerly seizing all the refuse thrown out by our cook, and eating it with evident delight. There was, however, nothing bold or disagreeable in their sad persistency. It was the desperate appeal of hopeless poverty; and it was with pity, not disgust, that I beheld these natives.

The finest painting that I saw in Mexico portrays an Aztec woman, in the time of Cortez, kneeling beside the body of her murdered husband, and appealing to a priest to save her from the fury of the conquering Spaniards. The scene, alas! is true to history. The Spaniards are responsible for what the Mexican Indians are to-day. The Aztec race was in many ways remarkably accomplished and intelligent. Their Spanish conquerors, however, mad with lust for gold, slaughtered them by thousands, and made the survivors, virtually, slaves. The Indians of to-day are, therefore, timid and retiring in manner, with a sad expression, as though they realized that they are now a crushed and conquered race. Are they susceptible of improvement? Undoubtedly. President Juarez—the ablest man whom Mexico has ever produced, the conqueror of Maximilian, and the architect of the republic—was a full-blooded Indian, a noble specimen of the old Aztec race.

I was surprised to learn how large a proportion of the present Mexican population is composed of descendants of the Aztecs. At least two-thirds of the inhabitants of Mexico are Indians, most of them poor, ignorant, and ragged. Even in the capital the proportion is about the same. I doubt not that a brilliant future is awaiting Mexico, thanks to the excellent government of President Diaz, the introduction of railroads, and the development of her magnificent mineral and agricultural enterprises; but there can be no question that she has before her an Herculean task in educating seven million ignorant Indians, and elevating them to decent life and the responsibilities of citizenship.

Our first real halting-place in Mexico was Zacatecas, one of the loftiest situations on the table-land, and we saw without regret the train move on and leave our special car upon a side-track till the following day. The view of Zacatecas from the railroad is impressive. Directly opposite the station rises a rugged mountain, wearing, as a unique and ever to be remembered ornament, a curving crown of perpendicular rocks, whose moss-like vegetation makes them look like malachite. Below this I beheld what seemed to be an Oriental city, since almost all the buildings had flat roofs, with walls of unbaked bricks, just as one sees them in the Holy Land.

The most remarkable feature of Zacatecas is its vivid coloring. Its varied hues are charming, and here an artist would be transported with delight. All the plastered walls are painted, and every street is, therefore, framed in red, orange, yellow, green, blue, or violet, adorned with gaily decorated signs. Many of the buildings, it is true, are dirty and dilapidated, and most of them have but one story. To scrutinize them closely is disenchanting; but, in the brilliant sunshine of the tropics and under the intense blue sky of Mexico, even squalid structures become picturesque. When I glanced down the streets, I usually saw a multitude of motionless or moving figures, their garments of white cotton half concealed by yellow, red, and purple blankets; and as I watched the multicolored groups, meeting and separating, or coming and going before the brightly tinted walls, I felt as if I were looking into a kaleidoscope. But, while the natives are attractive at a distance, a closer scrutiny reveals the fact that, "'Tis distance lends enchantment" to the Mexican. The peaked hat of straw or felt becomes, on near approach, a thing to be studied under a microscope; the bronzed face, looking in the distance so effective, is painfully innocent of soap and water; and it would be advisable to treat the brightly colored blanket as the Priest and Levite did the traveler on the way to Jericho, when they "passed by on the other side." As for the natives' shirts and trousers, they call to mind the sails of an old ship, snow-white, when seen upon the verge of the horizon, but proving upon closer inspection to be a gray and melancholy waste of soiled canvas, seamed with patches. It is not, I am sure, an exaggeration to say that one-half of the inhabitants of Mexico are either barefooted or wear a kind of sandal, consisting of a piece of leather strapped to the foot like a skate.

We saw a number of water-venders in Zacatecas, whose little tanks (strapped on their shoulders after the fashion of Italian organ-grinders), contained the drinking water which they were carrying to the houses; for water here is precious, and has been sold sometimes as high as two cents a gallon. If drinking water be thus scarce, it is painful to reflect on the bathing conveniences in this Mexican city. So far as my observation went, however, the lack of water for that purpose occasioned its inhabitants no uneasiness, — apparently to none of the natives was a bath either a reminiscence or an aspiration.

On one occasion we left our comfortable Pullman car to test the comforts of a genuine Mexican hotel. The halting-place selected for this doubtful experiment was Silao. It was midnight when we reached it. Leaving the train, a few steps brought us to a dimly lighted building, called "The Grand Hotel." A gray-haired man in négligé attire surveyed us, silently, as we approached.

"Buenas Tardes, Señor," we exclaimed, "have you received our telegram asking for five rooms?"

"I have," was the reply, "and they are ready. When do you wish to go to them?"

"As soon as possible, Señor."

"Will you have a blanket?" asked the gray-haired man.

I looked at him in some alarm, and ventured, "Yes."

"And sheets?"

"Why,— yes."

"And a pillow-case?"

"Ye—es."

"Do your companions also want such luxuries?"

I gazed at my companions. They were speechless with astonishment. Taking their silence for consent, the gray-haired man deliberately opened the door, not of the hotel-safe, but of a wardrobe. From this he took five scarlet blankets, ten sheets, five pillow-cases, and as many towels. Then calling a half-naked Indian, he piled this bedding on his back, as if he were a donkey, and bade him lead us to our rooms. After one look at the Indian, we much preferred to carry our own bedclothes; but, being too tired to attempt it, we followed him up the staircase.

This was no

easy undertaking, for the hotel corridors were in total darkness, and as our Indian was of the color of a burnt ginger-snap, he shed no radiance through the gloom. Providentially, however, though he was lost to us by the sense of sight, another of our senses permitted no doubt of his locality.

We presently found him lighting five candles for as many rooms. There was no choice in these apartments. Each had two iron beds, a lilliputian washstand, two chairs, and a scanty piece of matting stuck like a postage-stamp upon a floor of stone. There were no windows, and doors in the form of blinds gave to these rooms their only light and air. The night that followed marked the greatest triumph of insomnia that my life has ever known. In the first place, my pillow was as flat and hard as an adobe brick; and, secondly, some choice Silao fleas had left the Indian bedclothes-bearer for a change of diet. Then, too, to make my misery complete, close by the Grand Hotel, a chorus of roosters was rehearsing in distracting unison. Aroused by these, a score of dogs kept barking till they gasped for breath; while, ever and anon, a melancholy donkey, worn with toil, would burst into a fit of asinine hysterics, and shared apparently my mournful vigil till the dawn.

Leaving Silao the next morning, a short and pleasant journey brought us to Guanajuato, a curious old city, famous for three hundred years. With its flat-roofed adobe houses, it is, like Zacatecas, Oriental in appearance, and is surrounded by a range of mountains which look as lifeless as the moon, and as devoid of value as a beggar's hand. But, in reality, these mountains are veritable treasure-houses. Their tawny frames are interlaced with countless veins of silver, whose life-blood stirs the pulse of the financial world. The mines of Guanajuato are ranked among the richest on our planet, and they have given to the world a very large amount of its existing stock of silver. The visitor does not, however, see much evidence of wealth in Guanajuato's streets. Most of the buildings are as plain as though the neighboring hills were merely heaps of sand, the pavements are hardly more comfortable to walk on than the beds of dried-up mountain brooks, and the poor natives seem in want not only of silver, but of clothing. Yet, Guanajuato is a picturesque old town. Built on two sides of a ravine, its houses hang upon the cliffs, as if they had been blown into the air by some reckless blast, and had alighted by good fortune on convenient ledges. A hasty traveler would probably consider Guanajuato very unattractive as a place of residence, and might suppose its only inhabitants were poverty-stricken Indians; but a Mexican gentleman assured me that he would rather live here than anywhere else in Mexico, except the capital. "Why so?" I asked. "Because," was the reply, "the society of the town is delightful. Nowhere have I more charming friends than in Guanajuato."

WASHING TAILINGS.

We visited here one of the establishments where silver is extracted from the ore. Its high walls gave it the appearance of a feudal castle. Close by were some Indians, mining on their own account; for, even in the refuse of the mill, sufficient silver can be found to repay a native for his toil. Formerly no attention was bestowed upon such clay, and bricks were made from it for building purposes. To-day, however, it is known that there may be more silver in a single house wall than the entire structure is worth as a residence. Entering the mill, we found ourselves in a long, poorly lighted hall, filled with appliances apparently left over from the sixteenth century.

Each side was lined with shallow bowls half-filled with water. In these a certain amount of ore is placed, together with copper and sulphate of iron; and through the semi-liquid mass large stones are dragged for hours, by wretched mules, until the ore becomes a pasty mixture looking like black mud. This is then taken to an open courtyard where quicksilver and other ingredients are added. To mix these elements thoroughly, mules are made to tramp through it, back and forth, for about thirty days, until the filthy mass is ready to be washed, strained, and smelted. Experts declare that twenty per cent. of the precious metal is wasted by these primitive processes, and that with proper machinery the work could be far better done in a hundredth part of the time. But, even with present appliances, the profits are so large that there is little incentive for improvement.

Before I left the place, I had the curiosity to examine one of the mules, which had for months been tramping through the mixture. It was a pitiable sight. Its color was a ghastly green, its eyes were nearly closed, exposure to the mineral mass had burned the hair and some of the flesh from feet and legs, and thoroughly poisoned its whole system. I do not know of any animals in the world more worthy of pity than the mules of Guanajuato. Omnibus horses lead a life of luxury and ease compared with them. Not only do these mules have to drag, blindfolded, for many years their heavy burdens in the treadmills; but, finally, when old and helpless they come into this courtyard to be killed gradually by the mineral poison, which causes them to assume meantime the varied hues of the chameleon.

The Citadel of Guanajuato (now used as a prison) has played a prominent part in Mexican history. During Mexico's war for independence, in 1810, by which she sought to free herself from Spanish tyranny, Guanajuato was the heart of the rebellion and the scene of its most desperate struggles. Here the brave patriot-priest Hidalgo (in some respects the Washington of Mexico), having raised the standard of revolt against the Mother Country, gave battle to the Spanish army and defeated it. It is true, this victory was soon avenged, and eleven years rolled by before Hidalgo's dream of Mexican freedom could come to pass; but finally it was realized, notwithstanding the heroic patriot had meantime perished in the strife, and though upon a corner of this citadel his head had been displayed as a ghastly trophy, in the vain hope of striking his compatriots with fear.

While walking through the streets of Guanajuato, I saw an Indian going from house to house, and offering for sale a coffin! We sometimes think that the Mexicans have no enterprise; but, really, for an undertaker to send out drummers to solicit trade was a little beyond anything I had ever met before. This incident had a remarkable effect upon our guide.

"That reminds me," he cried, "we must now ascend the hill to the cemetery."

"Climb to a graveyard?" exclaimed one member of our party scornfully, "not I, it is too hard work."

"My friend," replied the guide, "fear nothing. You shall be wafted there, as if upon a cloud. We are to ride on burros."

He vanished, and a few minutes later the promised donkeys came in sight. They had a melancholy look, as if repeated visits to the graveyard depressed their spirits. All of them had rough, unkempt hair, and on their backs had been placed bags of corn-husks, as substitutes for saddles. One donkey was distinguished from the rest by having a piece of rope for a bridle, but the others were supposed to be guided merely by the rider's kicks. So huge, however, were the corn-husk saddles that when we mounted them our limbs looked like the blades of a tailor's shears stretched to their full extent, and not a heel could possibly approach the body of the beast like letter-boxes in a post-office. In these receptacles the dead of Guanajuato are left, as books are placed on shelves, one tier above another, and when a space is filled with a coffin, the opening is closed with a marble slab that serves not only for a door, but also for a tombstone. Some of these pigeonholes are bought outright for a hundred dollars, but the greater number are merely rented for five years. When the time expires, the bones are taken out, and the space is swept and garnished for the next comer, like a berth in a sleeping-car.

"What becomes of the evicted tenants?" I inquired.

"Look there and see," was the reply.

I turned, and saw two well-nigh naked grave-diggers tossing up skulls and bones from a trench in the enclosure.

"At first," explained the guide, "the bodies taken from the walls are buried here; but even this is only for a little time. Five acres do not constitute a cemetery large enough for Guanajuato; hence, the first occupants must soon resign their places to others."

"What is then their destination?" I asked.

"They go down to the catacombs," he answered; "would you like to see them?"

WAITING FOR AN ENGAGEMENT.

AN OLD GRAVE-DIGGER.

I hesitated. "I will go down," exclaimed the photographer, "I wish to see if there is light enough there for making illustrations."

Accordingly he disappeared. A moment later, we heard a cry of horror, and soon beheld his face emerge from the ground, white as a sheet, and with distended eyes.

"Look here," he said, "I don't want to stay down there alone. You must all keep me company."

"What is it?" we demanded.

"It is indescribable," murmured the artist, "go down and see."

Thus urged, we made our way down twenty steps and entered a long corridor. There was a general exclamation of astonishment. Before us was a crypt about twenty feet in height and one thousand feet in length. For centuries it has served as the receptacle of bones discarded from the court above, till almost the entire space is now filled to the roof with skulls, legs, arms, ribs, hip-joints, and shoulder-blades heaped up from floor to ceiling, like corn-cobs in a granary. Moreover, in the immediate foreground, thirty or forty mummies have been placed upright against the wall, and look like ghastly sentinels guarding the chaotic mass of their companions.

The most useful plant in Mexico is the Maguey. "It is a cactus," I exclaimed, when I first beheld it.

"It does belong to the cactus family," was the reply, "and closely resembles what you call the Century Plant. In Mexico, however, it is not allowed to bloom; but, on the contrary, at flowering time the Mexicans cut into its nucleus or heart. The cavity thus formed is filled at once with a rich, liquid sap, which is a source of enormous profit to the owner.

MILKING THE MAGUEY.

At this stage of the plant's development a native comes to it several times a day to do the milking."

"What do you mean by 'milking' a plant?" I asked in some amusement.

"I refer to the extraction of its sap," was the reply, "and if you watch yonder native, you will see how it is done." I turned, and saw an Indian thrust the point of a hollow tube into the cavity of the plant, and suck the other end with all his might. His powers of persuasion in that line were certainly remarkable, for the sap, yielding to the suction, immediately filled the tube which the Indian quickly emptied into a pig-skin carried on his back. "This does not seem to me very appetizing," I said, "but it is interesting. What next is done with it?"

A MAGUEY FARM.

"Look over there upon the road," he rejoined; "that cart, the mules of which are raising such a dust, is loaded with pig-skins full of sap. They are to be taken to the farm, and emptied into vats, in which the liquid will ferment for twenty-four hours, till it becomes pulque (a magic word in the republic), when it is sent away to be immediately sold."

"Why 'immediately'?" I inquired, "can it not be bottled up and kept like lager beer?"

"Impossible," said my companion. "It will not remain sweet more than forty-eight hours. Moreover, the least adverse ingredient will ruin it. An overseer, who had been discharged by his employer, once revenged himself by throwing a few drops of acid into his master's vat of pulque, thus spoiling what was worth a thousand dollars."

We climbed a little elevation and gazed upon the farm. It was a pretty sight. For many miles the fields looked like gigantic carpets of a terra-cotta groundwork, with the huge plants as decorative figures on their surfaces.

"How much time does the maguey require to ripen sufficiently to give forth sap?" I asked.

"About seven years," was the response. Even on reaching maturity, it furnishes the precious liquid for only about six weeks, and then dies; but, since another is immediately planted in its place, there is a constant series of arrivals and departures of maguey plants on these farms, like successive classes graduating from, and entering, a public school.

The owner of a pulque farm is usually wealthy; for the maguey crop can be counted on with absolute certainty. No insects spoil it, no weather affects it, and it can be made to yield the whole year round. Best of all, the liquid is at once disposed of at a good price and for ready cash. I gained some conception of the extent of the business, when I was told that from this district a long train, loaded with nothing but pulque, goes to the City of Mexico every morning throughout the entire year; and that for running this train alone the Vera Cruz railroad is paid thirty thousand dollars a month, or a thousand dollars a day. One man in the City of Mexico owns sixty shops, and sells twelve hundred dollars' worth of pulque daily. He is supposed to make a profit of sixty thousand dollars a year. A Mexican gentleman told me that his father owned a plantation of about ninety thousand maguey plants, one-tenth of which reach maturity every year. From this "small" plantation he receives an income of ten thousand dollars annually.

"Why does not every one go into the pulque business?" I asked.

"More would undoubtedly do so," was the answer, "but (fortunately, or unfortunately), the district where good pulque can be produced is limited to a small area, and hence the farmers in that region have a monopoly."

Personally, there are few things of which I am so certain as the fact that I would infinitely rather be a producer of pulque than a consumer. I never shall forget the first glass of it that I tasted. An Indian Hebe offered it to me at a railway station, and I paid only a cent for it; but after one swallow, I considered a penny an exorbitant sum for what I had obtained. In color, consistency, odor, and taste Mexican pulque seemed to me like sour mucilage. People assured me that I would like it after a time. If so, it will be when "my time has come." Some travelers, however, find its taste agreeable, and the Mexicans are as fond of it as negroes are of watermelons.

On awakening, next morning, I found that we were side-tracked near an aqueduct of grand proportions. I rubbed my eyes. "Where are we?" I exclaimed, "in Rome?"

"No," was the answer, "but near one of the most interesting cities of the Mexican republic, — Querétaro, which has a population of fifty thousand, and is situated as high above the sea as the summit of Mount Washington."

"And this aqueduct?" I demanded.

"It is the work of the Spaniards," was the answer. "Built here one hundred and fifty years ago, it still brings to the town delicious water from a spring five miles away. It makes its entry over seventy-four of these arches, the highest being ninety-four feet above the ground. Expensive?" he continued, "I should say so. Its cost was about one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars; but of that sum eighty-three thousand were contributed by one public-spirited citizen."

Leaving our car in the shadow of the aqueduct, we drove to the neighboring city of Querétaro. Its Plaza charmed us with its wealth of palms, banana trees, and semi-tropical vegetation. It was here that Maximilian, during the siege which terminated in his death, was wont to take his evening walk. Accordingly the place recalls one of the most pathetic episodes of modern history. The coming of Maximilian to Mexico was not like that of Cortez an attempt at conquest.

He came at the solicitation of a Mexican political party which he believed to be decidedly in the majority.

One day, in 1863, a dozen men-of-war from England, France, and Spain entered the harbor of Vera Cruz to obtain satisfaction for their governments. Satisfaction for what? Chiefly for financial loans which these European nations had made to Mexico, and which the Mexican authorities, declaring themselves bankrupt, had refused to pay. No wonder that poor Mexico was bankrupt. In forty years she had passed through thirty-six changes of government, and had had seventy-three presidents, — an average of nearly two a year. Distinguished Mexican representatives were, therefore, pleading with different European powers to come to her assistance.

THE HARBOR OF VERA CRUZ.

THE FOUNTAIN, QUERÉTARO.

One of the sovereigns to whom an appeal was made was Napoleon III. There is no doubt that he and others of the crowned heads of Europe received the proposition eagerly. Our great republic was then apparently in its death agony.

The time was ripe, they thought, to found an empire on the North American continent. Spain wished to give to Mexico a Bourbon Prince.

To this Napoleon

III. would not consent, but (willing to renounce French claims) agreed to accept an Archduke from the house of Austria, — Maximilian. He was a man of noble character and lofty principles. Within his veins flowed royal blood, distinctly traceable through six hundred years. He was accomplished, spoke six languages, and had a gentle disposition, which attracted all with whom he came in contact. This Prince, in April, 1864, having renounced his rights to the throne of Austria, sailed with his wife, Carlotta, for the land where they aspired to found a new and glorious dynasty. They were both young; he was but thirty-two, and she only twenty-four years old. The prospect was alluring. Napoleon III. had pledged his army and his treasury to keep them on the throne; and they looked forward to the time when Mexico, reclaimed from anarchy, would, under their beneficent sway, assume her place among the nations of the earth, — a close ally and protégé of the Old World.

THE BRIDGE.

Remembering these facts, we left the Plaza of Querétaro and approached a picturesque stone bridge upon the outskirts of the town. "This," said the Mexican colonel who was our guide, "was the last point yielded by the imperial army. When this was taken by our troops, no hope remained for Maximilian." Napoleon III. (alarmed at the decisive action of the United States), had heeded Secretary Seward's warning and withdrawn his troops, and, thus deserted, the Conservative party, which had enthusiastically welcomed Maximilian, was now unable to withstand the Liberals under President Juarez. It was unfortunate that Maximilian remained in Mexico. He should have abdicated, and returned to Europe with Napoleon's troops; but certain motives, which we must admire, still detained him. Aside from an unwillingness to give up and confess an ignominious failure, he wished, if possible, to save from vengeance the men whose cause he had espoused and who were clinging to his fortunes. Their doom, however, like his own was rapidly approaching. The old Convent of Querétaro, known as La Cruz, was the last retreat and stronghold of the Emperor. It was two o'clock in the morning when Maximilian's bosom friend and trusted officer, General Lopez, having resolved to play the part of Judas, proceeded silently through the dark streets to a small opening in the city wall, where he conferred with the republican commander. A plan of action was agreed upon, and so adroitly was it carried out that, two hours later, Querétaro and Maximilian were captured by the Liberals.

HOUSE WHERE MAXIMILIAN WAS CONFINED.

About a mile beyond the city walls is a little eminence called the Hill of the Bells. Hither, at seven o'clock, on the morning of the 19th of June, 1867, were brought the three distinguished prisoners who had been condemned to die, — the Emperor Maximilian and his leading generals, Miramon and Mejia. Three stone posts mark the places where they stood. Stationed at a little distance from them were three thousand soldiers. On arriving, Maximilian stepped from his carriage and handed to a servant his hat and handkerchief, which he requested should be given to his mother and brother. Are we surprised that he left nothing for Carlotta, the wife whom he so dearly loved? It was because he had been told (no doubt to make his death the easier to bear) that she was dead. If he had known the truth! In reality, poor Carlotta, who had gone to Europe in the vain hope of gaining some assistance for her husband, had, through her terrible anxiety and disappointment, become hopelessly insane. At length the Emperor turned and looked upon the seven men chosen to be his executioners. "Poor fellows!" he murmured, "they have an unpleasant duty before them." Then, drawing from his pocket seven twenty-dollar gold pieces, stamped with his inscription, he gave them to the officer in command to be presented to the soldiers when he was no more. "My friends," he said (pointing to his breast) "be good enough to spare my face and aim directly here." Then, looking about him on the lovely landscape, he exclaimed: "What a beautiful day! It is on such a day as this that I have always wished to die."

THE SQUAD OF SOLDIERS.

The men who here awaited death were of different nationalities and each, unconsciously, at this impressive moment showed the characteristics of his race. Mejia was an Indian, and stood with the composure of a fatalist, sadly but uncomplainingly accepting the decree of destiny. Miramon was of Franco-Spanish origin, and brilliant and audacious jested to the last. The Emperor, with the well-known temperament of the house of Austria, faced death with dignity like his ancestor, Marie Antoinette. His first position was in the centre of the group, but at the last moment it was changed. Miramon, who was at the Emperor's left, turning toward Maximilian had laughingly exclaimed, "You see that in this tragedy I am in the position of the impenitent thief." The Emperor answered gravely: "Permit me, then, to yield this place to you. A brave man like yourself deserves it." Thus speaking, he stepped quickly to the left, leaving Miramon in the centre; and it was where the stone post at the extreme right stands that Maximilian fell.

Returning from this mournful spot we saw, in the governor's palace at Querétaro, the plain pine coffin in which Maximilian's body was brought back from execution. It is in places deeply stained with blood. Not long, however, did his lifeless form remain in Mexico. A few months later, by permission of the Mexican Government, the body was taken to Vera Cruz, and the same vessel which, three years before, had brought Maximilian and Carlotta to the New World in perfect health and with the brightest anticipations, took back his mutilated form to Austria. Still more pathetic is the fact that the widowed Empress still lives, crazed with grief, a wreck upon the cruel ocean of existence.

Saying farewell to Querétaro with some reluctance, on the following evening we left the railroad at a station called El Castillo. Our purpose was to visit the Falls of Juanacatlan, sometimes enthusiastically styled the "Mexican Niagara." Upon the platform stood a gentleman who was presented to us under the euphonious name of Señor Bermejillo. His home is in the City of Mexico, but his estate at El Castillo is so vast, that, from the moment we arrived until we left, every point of land on which we stood, and almost everything we saw, was his property. In fact, he has constructed between the station and the falls a private tramway, by which in twenty minutes we reached a place where we beheld in their majestic beauty the Falls of Juanacatlan. The river Lerma (the largest stream in Mexico) here falls seventy feet in one grand mass of creamy foam, six hundred feet in breadth. Of course this cannot seriously be ranked with the stupendous volume of Niagara, yet at a glance one sees a resemblance to it. It is, in fact, Niagara in miniature, — a diamond edition of the Horseshoe Falls; or, as it were, Niagara itself seen through the large end of an opera-glass. We stood for a long time beside this falling river, delighted with its cool, refreshing spray and its unceasing rush and roar. No doubt its beauty appealed to us with added force because of the comparative rarity of waterfalls in Mexico. What I most missed and longed for during our Mexican tour was running water, especially as only a few months before I had been traveling in Norway, which is preëminently, of all the countries of the world, the land of cataracts and cascades.

It was seven o'clock in the evening when our train arrived in the City of Mexico. A friend who had been notified of our arrival met us on the platform.

"You are in luck," he cried, "there is to be a splendid ball at the Jockey Club to-night. I have secured a ticket for you, and you must go."

"What! after ten days' constant travel?" I replied. "No, no, I am too tired." "But to-morrow you can rest." "I have not time now to get ready." "You need not go till midnight." "My dress suit is at the bottom of my trunk." "I will unpack it for you."

"I do not know the way." "I will call for you in my carriage. Besides," he added, "you will have a chance to see our prettiest señoritas and our President."

CITY OF MEXICO.

THE RAILROAD STATION.

Some hours later, I found myself riding through the city. It was the hottest season of the year, yet both my comrade and myself were comfortable in light overcoats. Through the cab windows I could see block after block of buildings standing ghostlike in the silvery moonlight. Enormous windows, iron gratings, and frequently in front of them a line of donkeys driven by swarthy Indians, succeeded one another in a weird monotony. Two or three times my comrade pointed out a souvenir of history.

“Along this street,” he said, “Cortez retreated from the Aztec capital. Just here his leading general, Alvarado, made his famous leap for life, and this,” he added, “was the residence of Marshal Bazaine during the French occupation under Maximilian.”

“Stop a moment,” I said, and leaning forward I surveyed the former dwelling of the man whose cruelties contributed so much to Maximilian's downfall, and who, on his return to France, betrayed his country by surrendering Metz to the Prussians, and, consequently, died a wretched exile in a foreign land. Nevertheless, in looking at these structures, I did not seem to realize where I was; for, though accustomed to unlooked-for incidents in travel, I had never made so strange an entry into a foreign city, when, four hours after my arrival, I drove through moonlit streets with a comparative stranger to a ball, and on the way beheld the forms of dusky Indians crouching in their blankets, and gazed on buildings dating from the days of Cortez. At last we reached the mansion of the Jockey Club, — a handsome structure covered with glazed tiles.

This singular decoration owes its origin to caprice.

The Mexicans, to exemplify an almost incredible climax of extravagance, are wont to say, "He never will build a house of tiles." Some years ago, however, one of the gilded youth of Mexico resolved to prove that such display was not impossible, and built a house which is enameled from roof to pavement with blue tiles. This, when I saw it on the night of my arrival, was gay with lights, and diffused its radiance through the darkness like a porcelain lamp.

Alighting from the carriage, we entered the mansion which was thronged with guests. Around its spacious courtyard tropic plants formed fragrant walls of foliage and flowers; and over and around these banks of color floated soft music from an unseen orchestra. Meantime, in the rooms above, the music of a second orchestra invited all to join in dancing, the pastime in which Mexicans excel.

At length my comrade led me to a room apart and said, "Allow me to present you to the honored chief of our republic,

President Diaz." I saw before me a tall, dignified man about fifty years of age. Although attired in civilian's dress, a glance would have assured me he had been a soldier. His manner was extremely courteous; but I could not forget, even amid these fashionable surroundings, that I was in the presence of a man accustomed to command and able to maintain his power against desperate odds. Porfirio

PRESIDENT DIAZ.

Diaz is not only a brave soldier, and the best ruler Mexico has ever had; he is, besides, an able statesman, who has encouraged the building of railroads, promoted agricultural enterprises, and established friendly intercourse with other nations. At the same time, he has shown wonderful ability and tact in quieting and strengthening his own land, previously torn by frequent revolutions. On coming into power, instead of banishing or shooting his opponents, he won them over to his side. Thus, he would send for a man who had been a captain in some revolutionary faction, and would say to him: "My friend, you see you are defeated. I have the power now and mean to keep it; but far from wishing to be rid of you, I need just such brave men as you to help my administration. Let us be friends. You are a captain now; henceforth, in my army, be a colonel." This shrewd, conciliatory course proved remarkably successful, and the former enemies of Diaz are now his friends.

The morning after the ball I started out with my companions to see the City of Mexico by daylight, and we drove immediately to the Plaza Mayor, or Great Square, which occupies the centre of the capital. Before us, on one side, rose the cathedral, which from a distance had appeared to be well proportioned, while its fine towers had won our admiration. The site of the building is historic; for, on the spot where now its gilded crosses rise toward heaven, stood formerly the grandest temple of the Montezumas, so that the foundation of this Christian church rests on the broken images of Aztec gods. We climbed to one of its belfries and gazed upon the scene below. Directly at our feet lay the Plaza Mayor, which four hundred years ago was an open space before the Aztec temple.

This square was then the nucleus of the city's life and around it were its finest buildings. A Roman would have called it the Aztec Forum. The residence of Montezuma has been replaced, on the same site, by the National Palace, where all the different governments with which poor Mexico has been blessed or cursed, for centuries, have for a time had their headquarters. At present it contains the official apartments of President Diaz and many of the State Departments.

Descending from the belfry we entered the cathedral. Its grand dimensions are imposing, for the vast structure has a length of nearly four hundred feet. Formerly, too, if we can credit what the Spaniards say of it, the richness of its decoration rivaled that of any other in the world; but most of that magnificence has disappeared, and what remains cannot atone for many serious blemishes. Thus, for a church like this to have a wooden floor is painfully incongruous; and stuccoed walls, however large, cannot command our admiration like statue-crowned and exquisitely sculptured stone. Its chapels, it is true, contain a vast amount of gilded ornamentation; but iron gratings tipped with gold-leaf are not to be compared with the elaborately carved woodwork that we see in Spain, or with the balustrades of malachite and porphyry which we find in Russia; while the majority of statues in all Mexican churches are merely plaster, colored as brilliantly as chromos.

The hotel in the City of Mexico best known to travelers was formerly the palace of the short-lived Emperor, Iturbide, whose name it bears. It looks palatial still. It has a height rarely attained by Mexican houses; electric lights suspended from the roof give to its shadowy corridors the effect of moonlight; and, most astonishing of all, an elevator (the only one in the republic in 1892) ascends serenely to the upper story. But from these brilliant externals the tourist must not expect too much from the Hotel Iturbide. Its proprietor has not fully recovered from the attack of self-esteem which the acquisition of the elevator gave him. He sits and looks at it, like a mother gazing on her first-born; and as the stewards on a certain line of trans-Atlantic steamers say, "Our table is poor, but we have never lost a life," so the proprietor of the Iturbide blandly answers all complaints by proudly pointing toward his elevator, which, by the way, is allowed to run only between the hours of ten in the morning and ten at night!

The agent of an American excursion party once applied to the manager of the Iturbide for accommodations. "How much are these rooms a day?" he asked. "Four dollars each," was the reply. "But," said the agent smiling, "I shall probably bring you eighty people, how much then?" "Five dollars," said the proprietor, yawning; "that will make more trouble."

One day as I was strolling about the city, I noticed, on the upper story of a house, a bunch of newspapers tied with a string to the iron grating of a window. "What does that mean?" I asked.

"It is the recognized sign," was the reply, "that rooms are to rent there."

THE HOTEL ITURBIDE.

"What!" I exclaimed, "is it possible that, to avoid the expense of printing placards, it is the custom here to tie newspapers about a railing when one wishes to let rooms?"

"Precisely so," answered my informant, "and when a newspaper cannot be had, a bit of wrapping-paper answers the same purpose."

A MEXICAN HOUSE.

Not far from this, my companion pointed out to me another private residence, and said, "Beneath that corner window, for six months, regularly every night, I saw a faithful lover 'playing the bear.'"

"Playing the bear!" I echoed, "do you refer to the hugs which bears are wont to give their victims?"

"Oh, no!" was the reply, "the Mexican lover plays the part of Bruin in a cage. That is to say, at a fixed hour each day he saunters up and down the sidewalk near his loved one's house, gazes with rapture at her window, and puts his hand discreetly on his heart. Meantime he is being critically examined (no doubt through opera-glasses), not only by the young lady herself, but by all the other members of her family. After this dull business has dragged on for several weeks, the bear gets bold enough to write a note, and, holding it in his paw, allows his lady love to see it from a distance. That night she intercepts the servant and obtains it. Most probably, however, the note is read to her mamma and answered, if at all, at her dictation. At length the father appears upon the scene and makes inquiries into the habits of the bear, asking particularly how large an amount of honey he extracts from some commercial beehive!

If a bear market prevails, the lover is accepted. If not, he is warned off the premises." Meanwhile, during the period of courtship, if the gratings which exclude the bear are on the lower story, the lovers are fortunate indeed ; for, though the advances made by Bruin are not rapid, as an accepted suitor he is allowed to cross the street and talk with his inamorata through the bars. There he will offer her sweetmeats, and may sometimes hold her hand ; occasionally, he will even press it to his lips ; and, possibly, if the space be wide enough, — alas ! what will not lovers do in such a case from the days of Pyramus and Thisbe, to our own ? When the bars are on the second story, the wretched lover (forced by necessity to be inventive) induces some kind friend to lend his shoulders as a ladder, and even to play the guitar, so that the lady has the double pleasure of conversing with her fiancé and listening to a serenade. Sometimes, however, the serenader's back suddenly gives way, and Romeo unceremoniously drops from heaven to earth. Even when formally admitted to the house, the lover sees the lady only before others, until at last the marriage ceremony takes place, and he secures an opportunity to test the value of the Russian proverb: "Before going to war, pray once ; before going to sea, pray twice ; before going to get married, pray three times."

Excellent time is made on the tram-

ways in the City of Mexico. Some of the cars are furnished with a sign requesting passengers not to cause delay by making their farewells too long! This is, however, a necessary rule, for these affectionate people kiss repeatedly, and pat each other caressingly on the back, as they meet and part. Frequently, too, they daintily gather into a group the finger-tips of the right hand, press them an instant to the lips, and then expand them, like the opening of a tiny umbrella, blowing meantime upon the unfolding fingers as if to waft five kisses to the loved one.

Walking one day through the Mexican capital, I turned the corner of a street and stopped in astonishment at the sight before me. It was a tram-car drawn by four black horses, and adorned with wreaths of flowers and a tall black cross. Moreover, the sides were open, and on a platform in the centre a coffin was distinctly visible. This seemed to me the most extraordinary way in which to utilize a horse-car track that I had ever seen. I doubt if there is anything like it in the world, outside of Mexico; but here the tram-car companies are prepared to furnish hearses at all prices, from richly decorated vehicles drawn by horses to very plain cars drawn by mules. The great objection to these tram-car funerals is not, as might be supposed, their lack of privacy (for the blinds and doors of the cars can be tightly closed), but the rapidity with which the funeral trains are run in order to clear the tracks for regular traffic. In the cheaper grades of funerals the small black mules are driven wildly through the streets, and they rush around the corners at full gallop, presenting an astonishing combination of "the quick and the dead."

One of the most interesting buildings in the city is the National Museum, which contains valuable relics of the Aztec race. The first of these to attract my notice was a circular monolith of porphyry, three feet thick, twelve feet in height, and weighing twenty-six tons. Inscriptions prove that this was brought from the quarry to the Aztec capital four hundred years ago. The block itself is remarkable, but more wonderful still is the clear proof which its elaborate carvings give of Aztec civilization and enlightenment. This was their Calendar Stone on which a figure, carved in the centre, indicated the sun, while those which encircle it symbolized the months and days of the Aztec year, which was divided into eighteen months of twenty days each, with five complementary days added so as to make three hundred and sixty-five; and once in fifty years they are said to have allowed for the loss of minutes in their reckoning.

Nevertheless, the Aztecs were a curious combination of intelligence and barbarism. Close beside this intricate sun calendar, for example, stands a hideous idol nine feet high. It is the image of their God of War, and was the principal object pointed out to Cortez by Montezuma when he revealed to him the Aztec temple. It was then covered with gold ornaments and jewels, and on the ground before it was a pan of incense containing several human hearts, since to this horrible deity thousands of lives were annually offered. The number of these victims seems incredible. It is supposed that the yearly sacrifices throughout the Aztec empire numbered no less than twenty thousand; but reduce that estimate even one-half, and the result is appalling.

Remembering these facts, we shuddered as we looked upon the Sacrificial Stone which is, perhaps, the most horrible souvenir of priestly power and human cruelty that the world contains. It once stood on the summit of the Aztec temple which was, as usual, in the form of a pyramid. There, in the presence of the God of War, and altars never left without their sacred fire, rose this mysterious block of sacrifice. It is a solid mass of polished porphyry, nine feet in diameter and three feet high, with top and sides profusely carved with likenesses of kings, and signs whose meaning is not clearly known; but one sad fact is plain enough. In the centre of the block is a skull-shaped cavity, from which extends a channel to the outer edge. Within that cavity the victim's head was placed as he lay outstretched upon the stone. Five priests then held his head and limbs, while a sixth, arrayed in scarlet robes, cut open the victim's breast with a sharp, razor-like instrument, and drew forth the still warm and quivering heart. This he at first held up in triumph, then laid it down before the statue of the god, while thousands in the square beneath bowed low in fear and adoration. Meantime, down the deep channel chiseled in the stone flowed a red stream of sacrificial blood, a terrible libation to the angry deity. It is said that twelve thousand prisoners were sacrificed upon this block, at its dedication, in 1510.

On leaving the Museum, we made our way to a charitable institution called the Hospital of Jesus,—a building founded by Cortez on the very spot where Montezuma for the first time grasped the Spaniard's hand, and bade him welcome to his capital. It is worth remembering, in these days of will-breaking, that this old hospital is still maintained by the endowment bequeathed to it by the Conqueror, in spite of many attempts by governments and private individuals to annul the legacy. Reflecting on the sad events which quickly followed the meeting here of Cortez and the Aztec king, we climbed a stairway to the second story of the building, and gazed upon the only authentic painting of Hernando Cortez which exists in Mexico. It is not much to look at as a work of art, but it affords abundant food for thought, as one surveys those resolute features, in the very building founded by him centuries ago. With all his faults and cruelties, what energy and courage he possessed, what insight into human nature, and what a firm, indomitable will! The story of the Conquest reads like a romance. Though he had only a few hundred men, in two weeks after entering the Aztec capital Cortez had caused the sovereign, Montezuma, to be seized and held a prisoner, had captured the Aztec treasury, valued at six and a half million dollars, and had ordered many of Montezuma's ministers, who had counseled opposition to the invaders, to be burned to death. A few weeks later the broken-hearted Montezuma also died, despised by those who had formerly trembled at his glance.

We saw in the hospital the standard which the followers of Cortez bore through many desperate conflicts. Over what dreadful scenes of carnage has this banner floated! For the Aztec nation was not easily subdued. The armor of the Spaniards, and the sight for the first time of horses and cannon, took them by surprise; but when the invaders tried to burn their temples, and offered violence to their gods, the Aztec's national pride was touched beyond all power of control, and they arose en masse to rescue their country from invasion and their shrines from sacrilege. They were content to lose a thousand lives from their own ranks, if they could shed the blood of a single Spaniard. "The only trouble is," they proudly said, "there are too few of you to glut the vengeance of our gods!"

A mile or two outside the city stands a venerable cedar, known by the name of La Noche Triste, or "The Mournful Night." It was under this tree, on the eventful evening when the Spaniards retreated from the city, that even the iron resolution of Cortez failed him, and he wept bitterly at the seemingly overwhelming ruin which had come upon him. For, execrated and pursued by an appalling multitude of Aztecs, the Spaniards had been driven from the capital, fighting for life at every step, bleeding from countless wounds, and, apparently, destined to be massacred ere they could reach the coast. In view of the cruelty and bloodshed which they subsequently caused, it seems almost a pity that they did not all perish. Within a year, however, they had returned, and regained everything that had been lost.

Extending westward from the City of Mexico, is a magnificent avenue called the Paseo. This is a feature of their capital of which the Mexicans may justly feel proud, although they are indebted for it to the Emperor Maximilian. It is a noble boulevard, fully two hundred feet in breadth, and straight as an arrow for two miles. On either side are double rows of shade trees, beneath which stroll the multitudes who must content themselves with merely gazing at the brilliant spectacle of carriages and horses, as the fashionable world of Mexico sweeps by. At intervals, this driveway is embellished by six circular spaces intended for the statues of distinguished men. Some of these are already occupied; and that which most attracted me was the monument of Guatemozin, the nephew of Montezuma, and the last of the Aztec emperors. Few men have better merited a bronze memorial than this undaunted hero of a vanquished race. When he knew that his cause was absolutely hopeless, when Montezuma had expired, and the capital had become a vast charnel house, in which the invading Spaniards, sick at last of slaughter, could hardly take a step save on the body of an Indian, this Aztec king rejected every summons to surrender; and, finally, when taken prisoner on the last foot of soil which remained to him, he looked his conqueror, Cortez, proudly in the face and said: "I have done all I could to save my people, but have failed. Draw, then, that dagger from your belt and set me free!" Cortez, however, filled with admiration, did not strike the blow, although it would have been more merciful if he had done so then and there; for when the lust for gold had driven nobler feelings from the Conqueror's breast, he shamefully allowed the brave young Emperor to be tortured, in the vain attempt to force him to reveal the hiding-place of the Aztec treasures. Though his feet were soaked in oil, and he was suspended over a slow fire, no amount of suffering caused Guatemozin to betray his secret. The hidden treasure was never discovered, and though the deposed Emperor survived his torture, he was finally hanged by the command of Cortez.

CASTLE OF CHAPULTEPEC.

BIG TREES AT CHAPULTEPEC.

Reaching the limit of the avenue, we found ourselves before a rocky, isolated hill about two hundred feet in height. It was the world-renowned Chapultepec,—the favorite residence of Mexican rulers from Montezuma down to President Diaz. The present palace on its summit has no great antiquity, but the majestic cypresses around its base are many centuries old, and have cast their shadows impartially upon the Aztec and the Austrian, the conqueror and the conquered. In any portion of the world, apart from their historic associations, these trees would call forth admiration; for some of them are sixty feet in circumference, and Humboldt thought that one, at least, had an age of sixteen hundred years. It seems appropriate, therefore, that these monarchs of the past should wear, to-day, long pendent veils of soft gray moss, as if in mourning for the line of kings whose gardens once extended far beyond this hill. Perchance they also mourn their lost companions; for thousands of the trees between Chapultepec and Mexico were cut down by the Spaniards for material to rebuild the city which, in their final desperate conflict with the Aztecs, they had totally destroyed.

The finest of these arboreal giants is called the Tree of Montezuma. I felt myself a pygmy as I stood beside it, not merely in comparison with its gigantic form, but as I measured my brief life with the long series of eventful centuries, of whose slow march its gnarled and twisted limbs gave proof. This cypress may have flourished here before a human voice disturbed the silence of this grove, or a human foot was pressed upon the soil of Mexico. At all events, there is no doubt that it has sheltered Aztec princes glittering in barbaric splendor, and has looked down for centuries on Spanish cavaliers, sandaled monks, and beautiful Castilian ladies rendered still lovelier by their lace mantillas. American soldiers, too, have marched to be succeeded in their turn by French Zouaves; while, mournfully conspicuous in the historic throng above which its gray moss has waved its welcome and farewell, appeared the Austrian sovereigns, Maximilian and Carlotta, — ill-fated victims of Na-

oleon's dream of empire in the Western hemisphere.

The view from the summit of Chapultepec is one of the most beautiful in the world. Stretching away from the base of the hill lies an almost circular valley, forty-five miles in length and thirty-five in breadth. It is as level as a tranquil sea, and is surrounded by a mountain wall, which Nature seems to have raised around it to protect her favorite. What wonder that this view has captivated every conqueror who has beheld it? For, in the centre of this lofty plain, and girdled by empurpled mountains, like a gem encircled by a ring of amethysts, glitters the City of the Montezumas, — Mexico.

Two of these mountains are the extinct volcanoes, Popocatepetl and Iztaccihuatl, whose summits reach a height of nearly eighteen thousand feet. It is not strange that the Aztecs regarded them with superstitious awe and reverence, especially, as in their day, and even at the period of the Conquest, the action of Popocatepetl was at times extremely violent. Indeed, the name of Popocatepetl signifies "The Smoking Mountain," though, during the present century, the title has hardly been justified. Quite naturally, however, in the period of its activity the Aztecs deemed it the abode of tortured spirits, whose agonies within their fiery prison-house caused the terrific groaning of the mountain previous to an eruption, and, finally, the dreadful outburst of its flames and smoke. Until the coming of the Spaniards, no one had dared to ascend it; but the followers of Cortez, laughing to scorn the warnings of the Aztecs, made an attempt to climb it and succeeded. One of the party chosen by lot was lowered from the crater's edge four hundred feet into the horrible abyss, where he filled baskets with sulphur to be used in the manufacture of gunpowder. Strange, is it not? The violence of Popocatepetl ceased soon after the arrival of the Spaniards, but probably that deadly gift of sulphur proved far more fatal to the Aztecs than all the previous outbursts that had marked its history.

BURRO TRAIN.

Iztaccihuatl, or "The White Woman," derives its name from the fact that its form resembles that of a dead woman robed in white for burial. From some points of view the likeness is startling. The head appears to fall back, as in death; and from this lines of snow, like long disheveled silvery tresses, stream in all directions. An Indian tradition says that these volcanoes were once living beings, a giant and a giantess; but that the Deity, angered by their haughty independence, transformed them into mountains. The woman died at once and lies outstretched forever in a winding sheet of snow. Her lover, far less fortunate, is doomed to live in full view of her lifeless body; and when his sorrow becomes uncontrollable, he shakes the earth in his convulsive grief and pours forth tears of fire.

Saying farewell one morning to the capital we started to explore the temperate and tropic lands of Mexico, which lie between the ocean and the tableland, bathed in perpetual sunshine, and rivaling in beauty and luxuriance the golden gardens of Hesperides. In a few hours we had reached the edge of the great Mexican plateau, and, with some trepidation, began the wonderful journey toward Vera Cruz. I rightly call it wonderful, for the railway by which it is accomplished is one of the most remarkable specimens of engineering skill and courage that the world can show. Most of the descent of eight thousand feet is made in about twenty miles. The steepness of the track can, therefore, be imagined. Railroad grades seldom exceed a fall of one foot in a hundred; but here there is at times an incline of four feet in a hundred. Standing on the rear platform, we experienced the sensation of sliding down the mountains, and it seemed wonderful that the heavy train did not rush downward to destruction. What kept it from so doing was a monstrous double engine, used, not only to pull its heavy burdens up the mountains, but also to restrain them in the descent. When necessity requires it, one-half of the engine works in a direction opposite to that in which the train is moving, in order to retard the almost overwhelming force of gravitation. It is a serious undertaking; for any undue impetus on the edge of these stupendous cliffs would mean swift death to every one on board. Few accidents, however, have occurred; no doubt because they are so constantly anticipated. It is where men are heedless from a sense of perfect safety that real danger lies; not in the iron bridge watched carefully from hour to hour, but in the little culvert or the loosened rail.

I was astonished to perceive that though a brakeman stood on every car there were no air-brakes on our train. "We could not keep them," was the explanation. "As fast as we put them on, the natives, who are inveterate thieves, cut them off and carried them away. In fact, until we riveted the spikes that hold down the rails, they stole them also; and rubber pads on the steps of Pullman cars invariably suffered the same fate." I noticed that steel ties were used instead of wooden ones, and that the sides of the cars were made of corrugated iron; since it is claimed that wood will not endure the sudden changes, daily, from the intense heat of the tropics to the cooler table-land.

The scenery on this route is magnificent. At times we saw a broad expanse of cultivated fields three thousand feet below us, the whitewashed buildings on their surface resembling dice upon a checker-board. The trees looked so diminutive, that they recalled the tiny playthings of our childhood called "Swiss Villages." At one point, the descent was so precipitous, that the Indians, who had been selling fruit and flowers at a station half up the mountain, ran down the rocks and reached another halting-place before our train arrived, and were ready to renew their traffic. A characteristic feature of this railway journey was the variety of life and merchandise discernible at every station. No sooner would we halt than scores of dark-hued men and women swarmed about the cars, crying their wares in harsh, discordant tones which sounded like a chorus of creaking signs on a windy night. The number of these Indian traders, the miscellaneous objects which they sold, and above all the amount of necessary bargaining, in broken English and Spanish spoken on the installment plan, were both novel and amusing. Every part of Mexico seems to have a special article to tempt the tourist. In one place oranges are sold, the next produces baskets of all shapes and sizes; at Irapuato strawberries are offered every day, the whole year round; another place is famous for its handsome canes; another still, for opals or for onyx. Everywhere we heard the cry of "Pulque! Pulque!" and had that nauseating mixture offered us by hands that looked more uninviting than the drink itself, — all mute, inglorious witnesses of the scarcity of soap.

At length we reached our destination for the night, the little town of Orizaba. It was the edge of evening when we strolled through its streets. The temperature was as high as that of New York in July. The air was heavy with the odors of luxu- riant vegetation. Occasionally a tufted palm outlined its graceful form against the sky; yet, even then, we were not really in the Hot Lands. Compared with Vera Cruz and its adjoining territory Orizaba is cold; and the inhabitants of the coast actually come to this elevation for relief from heat, and to escape yellow fever which is here unknown. Perpetual summer reigns along this Mexican terrace; not hot enough to make existence unendurable, yet with an air sufficiently relaxing to cause ambition to appear a farce, exertion an absurdity, and any special interest in life beyond a cup of coffee, the aroma of a fine cigar, the music of a mandolin, and the smile of a fair señora, not worth the trouble that it costs. Yes, if there be a district in the world especially adapted to a life of dolce far niente, it is the natural terrace on which lie the little towns of Cordova and Orizaba, filled with the fragrance of magnificently timbered forests, and situated equidistant from a plain of almost equatorial heat and the cool shadows of Chapultepec.

On the Vera Cruz railway we traveled no further toward the coast than Orizaba, because the health officials had informed us that if our car descended to the Hot Lands, we should be quarantined on our return. Moreover, although this route is best adapted for a view of Mexico's temperate zone, in order to really see the tropics, another grand descent is preferable, along the recently completed railroad down the mountains to Tampico. Accordingly, we made our way to a different point on the edge of the Mexican plateau, prepared this time to take a plunge into the real Tierras Calientes.

It was seven o'clock in the morning when we left our car, and, on the brink of the great table-land, seated ourselves on vehicles, which, though much larger than our ordinary hand-cars, nevertheless resembled them. Two benches crossed each, one in the front the other in the rear, and in the space between was a heavy brake, upon the strength of which the safety of our lives depended; for we were now, by the force of gravity alone, to slide down from the temperate to the torrid zone, upon a curving track, in places steeper than the road to Vera Cruz. Of course, we might have taken a regular train upon this route, but from no ordinary conveyance could we have viewed and photographed the scenery to such advantage as from these open cars. The difference was as great as that between riding in a covered barouche and in an open wagon.

RAILROAD TO TAMPICO.

There was no danger of a collision, for we had seen the telegraphic order sent to hold the up-train at the base of the mountain till we should arrive. "Had the instructions been received and understood?" "Click, click, click," came the reassuring answer. It was all right; the track was clear, and it belonged to us. Vamos! The ride that followed was incomparably the most exciting of my life. Now we went dashing through a tunnel which had a temperature as cooling as a shower-bath, or whirling round a precipice upon a shelf of rock, beneath which was a gorge two thousand feet in depth; a moment later, we would slide in a straight line along the glittering grooves with a momentum that would have been frightful, but for the steady hand maintained upon the brake. Even when thus controlled, it seemed at times as if the car were actually alive and leaping forward on the rails like a thoroughbred on the race-track; for we were making a descent of seven thousand feet in fifteen miles, including the windings of the track. I must confess that there were moments when I felt a little nervous, and once, when we had attained a speed that made a gentleman from Chicago turn pale and raise his eyes toward heaven, as if considering what his chances were of going there, I called a halt and took some photographs. The railroad winds about the mountains in tremendous loops, like a gigantic serpent. Compared with many feats of engineering here, the famous Pennsylvania Horseshoe Bend sinks into insignificance. The scenery was glorious. The mountains, glistening to their summits with luxuriant vegetation, appeared to be covered with soft, velvet mantles. At times we heard that rare and most delightful sound in Mexico, — the music of a waterfall.

“What is that?” I presently inquired, turning my field-glass toward a mountain summit far above us, "can a farm be located at such a height?"

"Yes," said our guide, "it is a corn plantation, and a good one too."

"But how can it be cultivated?"

"Well," said the man, with a twinkle in his eye, "no one can really climb there to work it; but the owner plants

it from a distance by firing the seed from a shotgun; and, when the corn ripens in the fall, he harvests the crop with a rifle. You see the bullets cut the stalks, and, naturally, the ears of corn at once fall down the perpendicular cliffs!"

Around and below us, as far as the eye could reach, lay a vast ocean of intensely colored foliage. Sometimes a powerful field-glass separated this into plantations of bananas, coffee, sugar-cane, and cotton; in other places, Nature reigned supreme in jungles tenanted by Mexican tigers, lions, monkeys, and hyenas. At length our track grew level. This fact alone would have assured us we had reached the Hot Lands, even if the oppressive forests hold choice cabinet woods, in such profusion that mahogany ties are frequently used upon the railroad. The mountains, also, yield a vast amount of onyx, agate, and black marble. The American owner of an onyx mine in the vicinity assured me that although he had employed only fifteen men five years before, he then had a payroll of five hundred, and was sending onyx, not only to the City of Mexico, but to New York, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. Tobacco, too, is indigenous to this country, and was used in the halls of Montezuma long before the time of Cortez. In fact, as is well known, the tobacco plant derives its name from Tabaco, a place in Yucatan.

I doubt if there is anything more primitive and unconventional among the Hottentots than the homes and costumes of the Indians of the Mexican Hot Lands. Their wretched dwellings are not as substantial as the adobe huts of the plateau, but are composed of barrel staves, old railroad ties, sugar-cane stalks, pieces of matting, or even palm leaves. The bare ground usually serves the inmates for a bed, and the amount of clothing visible on the men and women is astonishingly scanty. The children walk about as innocent of dress as Raphael's cherubs. We occasionally saw articles of attire hung upon a line, but they belonged to the "section men" (usually Americans) employed along the railroad; for taking in washing is one way in which these Indians earn a livelihood. Another is the transportation of great burdens on their backs, and what they can accomplish in the way of burden-bearing is almost incredible. Many of them will carry heavy loads forty-five miles in a single day, and as a rule will surpass a horse in endurance. Their hair is usually left thick above their eyes, to serve as a matting for the strap which holds the load, and thus, with bowed heads, they will go as fast as a horse can walk. This is not a new characteristic of the Mexican Indians.

Before the Conquest letters were carried through the Aztec empire by swift-footed couriers, the distance between Vera Cruz and Mexico (about two hundred miles), being traversed in twenty-four hours. Such messages were, generally, transmitted in picture writings traced on cloth made from the Maguey plant; and in this manner Montezuma was informed of the landing of Cortez and his warriors on the coast.

One of the most enjoyable excursions that I made in Mexico was to the ancient Pyramid of Cholula. It does not look pyramidal at present, but appears to be merely a natural hill two hundred feet in height. Yet, though to-day irregular in shape and covered with vegetation, it was originally the work of man, and formed a mighty pyramid, upon the top of which stood an imposing temple. Under the hollow covering of earth that has collected upon its surface, it is composed of layers of clay and sun-dried bricks, which formed a solid mass, the base of which occupied no less than forty-five acres, while the summit reached a height of two hundred feet. The amount of labor here involved is almost inconceivable. "Did it, then, rank with the great Pyramids of Egypt?" one naturally inquires. In one sense, yes; for the enormous area of its base was larger; but, on the other hand, its height was not one-half as great as that of Cheops, or of Cephren, nor can its layers of bricks (though numbered here by millions) produce at all the same impression as do the mighty monoliths that make up the Egyptian pyramids, reared by an almost superhuman power beside the Nile.

GIVING TO TWO AT ONCE.

Reaching the summit of Cholula's ancient mound, we stood before the pretty church erected there. "The King is dead, long live the King!" One deity has been dethroned, another reigns here in his place. A Christian shrine now stands upon the Aztec pyramid, much as in Rome the statue of St. Peter surmounts the column of Trajan. Yet it would seem as if the deities thus expelled had left their curse upon the place, for only crumbling shrines and wretched hovels remain in the poor village of Cholula which, nevertheless, in the time of Cortez was the most sacred of all Indian towns, — the Mecca of the Aztecs.

Looking southward, a wonderful feature of the valley met our gaze in the silvery dome of Popocatepetl — a pyramid of God, beside which all the works of man dwindle to insignificance. One never tires of this majestic peak. For ages it has made the

ing in god-like dignity, wrapped in its mantle of eternal snow; and while empires, dynasties, and races have lived their little lives, like insects, at its base, it has remained, in Nature's realm, the real, incomparable, God-appointed sovereign of Mexico.

Whatever else of Mexico may be forgotten, I shall remember to my latest breath that wonderfully impressive vision from Cholula. Before me rose, against the darkening sky, a mighty cross, the sculptured proof that here Christianity had proved victorious; and as I lingered, my feet upon the Aztec pyramid, my hand upon the symbol of the conquerors' faith, my eyes turned toward that everlasting pinnacle of snow, I thought the lesson of Cholula to be this: that higher, grander, and far more enduring than all the different religions of humanity is the Eternal Power they imperfectly reveal; and that above the temples, pyramids, and crosses, which mark the blood-stained pathway of our race, rises a lofty mountain peak, whose glory falls alike upon the Aztec and the Spaniard, and in whose heaven-born radiance all races and all centuries may find their inspiration and their hope.
